We seek to exercise no control over the internal commerce of a State, but only to prevent a State from erecting herself, her geographical position, into a barrier to commerce between other States. We will give to her all the sovereignty possible under our dual system of Government, touching those matters over which she can exercise governmental powers at all; but she must concede that there is another sovereignty in the country, to wit, the people of the United States, and that their Congress can regulate commerce between the States, between New York and Pennsylvania, between New England and the valley of the Potomac. Gentlemen ought to remember that a good doctrine is often destroyed or made odious by running it into the ground, if polite ears will pardon me the expression. States may have sovereignty within their borders over their own internal concerns, but not over the commercial intercourse of the people of other States with each other, and which, perchance, can only be had by using the rivers, roads, or bays of intermediate States. It is just here that Congress has power, and its analogy is found in the jurisdiction of the United States courts over controversies between citizens of different States.

Would it not be competent for Congress in exercising the power to regulate commerce to enact that on all public highways and lines of travel and transportation across the territory of a State from border to border, the citizens of every State shall have equal rights in the transportation of goods and passengers passing from State to State, and no preference or exclusive privileges shall be given to one line, route, or mode over any others in any rules or regulations touching the conveyance of goods and passengers from State to State; and that every citizen of the United States might elect what route or line he would himself travel or cause his merchandise to be transported on? Would not such a provision be plainly constitutional? I do not ask it is expedient, but is it constitutional? It is a regulation of commerce between the States, and nothing else. Apply the same general rule to a specific case, and you have the case in hand.

A power in Congress to regulate commerce and a power in a State to obstruct it or to drive it into a given channel are wholly incompatible. They cannot possibly both exist; and Congress cannot regulate without the right to remove obstructions or to abolish unwise regulations made by States. A grant by New Jersey of an exclusive right of transportation from New York to Pennsylvania across its territory; with a tax to New Jersey annexed, is an obstruction to commerce between the States, and calls for the interference of Congress by exercising the power to regulate commerce between the States. If Congress has no power to interfere in such a case, then it is palpable that any State may prohibit commerce across her territory between States. And in what a condition that would put this nation! The right to grant an exclusive transportation line implies the right to make a prohibition. If she may tax passengers a few cents she may tax them ten dollars. If she may make a given line exclusive she may grant it power or command it to charge enormous or even prohibitory rates, or she may take and own the railway herself and run it on that idea or refuse to run it at all. The position is full of absurdities. The clause of the Constitution must have been intended to cover just such a case. If it does not it is worthless. The resistance made by the Camden and Amboy monopoly proves that there is an obstruction to commerce, a tax upon it, a discrimination in their favor by which they are benefited. The very resistance they make proves the need of interference. They are entitled to all the money they can make as common carriers in fair competition with others. To the extent the public is injured for their benefit the injury ought to be removed and the benefit denied. Monopolies are odious; they are contrary to the spirit of our Government; they are contrary to the spirit of the age; they are ruinous to commerce, which is the wealth of nations; and they are an offense to that great DEMOCRATIC IDEA which is conquering the world in its ever-aggressive warfare on prerogative and its traditions, "The world is governed too much." Let the bill be passed.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. At an early period of this session I introduced a bill for the purpose of establishing a through route from New York to Washington. I did so under the belief that the necessities of the public required that such a through route should be established by Congress. In listening to the various arguments that have been made upon the bill now before the House I have not found in any one of them precisely the same view of the whole matter which I myself take.

Before discussing the legal points involved, I will simply premise that as I understand it the passage of the bill now before the House is utterly inconsistent with the idea of having a through route. In other words, that it would be necessary to have all the profit of the road from New York to Philadelphia to complete the road from Philadelphia to Washington; so that the present proposition is therefore in fact an abandonment of the idea of a through route.

That Congress has the power to create new post and military roads between any two points I have no doubt. That it can create a new post route between Washington and New York is in terms covered by the language of the Constitution, section eight. But a proposition like the one now before us, to change the local institutions of a State, is an entirely different matter. Where there is concurrent jurisdiction between the United States and State governments, wherever the United States has power to legislate upon the same subject in reference to which the State Legislature can enact laws, there each acts independently of the other. The Supreme Court of the United States, for the purpose of avoiding any possible conflict in matters of concurrent jurisdiction between the United States and State courts, have gone so far as to hold that when property claimed by individuals is seized by State officers the United States courts cannot interfere with it; and wherever property is seized by a United States officer, there no State can institute a process interfering with it. This is necessary for the purpose of avoiding collision where there are questions of concurrent jurisdiction. Allow me to illustrate this principle by an example: if the State of New Jersey has passed a law for the purpose of punishing counterfeiting, over which it has concurrent jurisdiction with the United States, Congress cannot amend that law, Congress cannot pass an act changing its character; but Congress can pass an original act prescribing what shall be the penalty under its authority.

Questions of this nature depend upon the same principle. The Legislature of New Jersey had a right to incorporate a railroad company. It had a right to prescribe the terms upon which alone it would grant a charter. Such charter is an exercise of the sovereign power of the State. The railroad company became in part a political agent of the State, possessing and exercising a part of its sovereign power. Such companies have usually authority to seize the property of persons who refuse voluntarily to convey it. They are not political agents of a State to the same extent as a county or a city may be, but they are political agents of the State of the same character and nature. Therefore it follows that unless Congress can change the powers conveyed by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey upon a county or a city, it cannot change the charter of a railroad company. It may create a new company, but it cannot disturb or pervert the relation which a local institution bears to the State which creates it. A railroad company is an artificial being, the law of whose existence is its charter. Its power to contract, to hold or sell property, and for all other purposes, is absolutely dependent upon and measured by its charter. The Legislature of New Jersey create by act the Raritan company, prescribing its sphere of action, its duties and powers, and Congress cannot change that charter by enlarging or restraining the duties and powers of the company, because Congress cannot directly amend or change a State law.

Again, it has been decided by the United States Supreme Court that a charter constitutes a contract between the State and the company. It constitutes an agreement by which the State on the one side confers certain franchises, and the company as a consideration undertakes to perform certain duties which the Legislature imposes on it. Can Congress change that contract? By this contract the State undertook to give to the company the right of carrying passengers for local purposes. It required that the whole capital of the company should be invested in that particular business. That was a question of policy with New Jersey. The company accepted the charter on those terms. They became bound that no portion of the capital should be diverted from the object for which the charter was granted—that none should be diverted to general traffic or carrying through passengers. Has Congress the power to change that contract as between the State and its creature? Has it the power to say that we can release the company from a single condition of that charter or duty assumed toward the State which created it? That is an important question.

It arises not only in the case now before the House, but arises in another bill by which this House undertakes to sweep away State institutions and State rights; in a bill by which we donate $35,000,000 per annum of the people's money to overgrown capitalists—I mean the bank bill, by which you endeavor to release the State banks from their contracts with the several States. You tell the banks of Wisconsin which have received privileges under the law of the State and contracted to pay a certain stipulated tax, that they may enjoy their privileges and escape the tax. You tell the banks of New York that by bad faith they may escape the liability they have assumed toward the State, and protect themselves against honest responsibilities under an act of Congress. But looking to this broad charter of constitutional law, I insist that this invention is as weak as it is wicked. Neither the Bank of Commerce or any other State bank can cease to be a State institution liable to State authority, except in the manner prescribed by State laws. If you will allow me so far to pass out of the record, I would suggest that the greed of those banks and moneyed men, who have abused the confidence of the Secretary of the Treasury for the last three years, who have through their influence over him kept the price of greenbacks fluctuating, now sending the gold market up, and now, as their speculations require, forcing it down, is in their banking scheme overreaching themselves. Not content with purchasing bonds with greenbacks, worth about fifty-seven cents on the dollar as compared with gold, and receive what in greenbacks would be equivalent to over ten per cent. as interest, they wish Government to transfer to them the right to issue currency, and pay them by selling bonds to them; ten per cent. for the use of paper whose sole value is founded upon Government credit. They persuade our worthy Secretary of the Treasury, who requires a revenue of $350,000,000 per annum, that he ought to make war upon the State currency, bankrupt the unfortunate people who hold it, limit the whole circulation of the country to $350,000,000, give them the sole right of issuing it, and then Government will have all the money it wants without difficulty, and the people be able to pay the increased taxes. I would suggest to these worthy gentlemen who claim to monopolize the whole moneyed power and property of the country that in this war both against the people and common honesty, which they are inaugurating, they may come out the losers, and in the fierce passions engendered by such a struggle to get rid of a foul monopoly, they may endanger the principal as well as the mere winnings of a corrupt legislation. They are not playing a safe game.

But apologizing for this digression on the ground that on the passage of the bank bill all debate was cut off by the previous question, and one can hardly resist the temptation of saying something by the way of warning, when he has the power, I return to the legal proposition before us. That proposition is as to the right of Congress partially to abrogate a contract between a State and a company, leaving the company in possession of all the franchises and rights derived from the State, but relieving it of all its corresponding duties and obligations.

It is a most important principle, striking at the very existence of State constitutions, striking at the very existence of all contracts; ay, striking at the decisions which the courts of the United States have followed from the time of the Dartmouth College case down to the present time. There can be no such thing as a contract without two parties. There is consideration on the one side and an agreement on the other, and any course of legislation or decisions which bind the one side to its contract and deprive the other of the benefits which it was to receive from it, is a violation of one of the plainest principles of justice.

I say then, so far as any institution of New Jersey is concerned, receiving franchises, seizing property, turning citizens out of their homesteads, depriving them of their property by virtue of the right which they receive from State authority, and so far as we seek to enable such parties holding such rights to come in and get rid of the obligations which they assumed we are sanctioning a gross violation not only of contracts in the abstract, but of that common honesty which every man should seek to uphold.

Therefore it is that I insist that although you have not the right to amend a State law, although you have not a right to come in here and change a relation which a mere municipal institution of a State bears to the State that created it, although you have not a right to come in here and release two parties to a contract from the obligations which that contract imposes upon them respectively, Congress has the right as an original proposition to charter a road, to create a new post road from New York to Washington. It will be perceived that the relations between New Jersey and the Camden and Amboy road do not affect the argument which I advance. New Jersey in her legislation is bound by that charter. Congress cannot relieve her from its obligations. But while Congress cannot intervene between the parties to that charter, it can in the exercise of its original power create a new company, leaving New Jersey and her corporations to arrange their own contracts and rights.

The gentleman from Kentucky, who last spoke, sought to illustrate his argument by two instances, which I will here cite. Why, he asked, can Kentucky prescribe a condition upon which parties may use the waters flowing through Kentucky? I answer, yes; if Kentucky created these waters. If they were not created by the Almighty, and were merely by certain acts of Congress prescribed as common highways, I say yes, she would have the right, because they were her own creation. And Congress, when it seeks to deprive Kentucky of that right, must compensate her, because ownership and the right of prescribing terms follow one the other. Let me illustrate my meaning by a supposed case. New Jersey proposes to build a new State House, and makes a contract with mechanics. The plans and specifications are perfect ones for that purpose. But the United States want a powder magazine, and it is absolutely necessary that Government should have it. No one will doubt the power of the United States to build or establish such a magazine. Could Congress direct the contractors who are building the State House to change the plan and construct vaults for powder under the New Jersey halls of legislation? The answer is, that New Jersey may build its own State House and the United States their own magazine; the right of each is separate and distinct; the one cannot interfere with the other. In like manner New Jersey may construct her own roads for her own purposes, and to be employed as she shall prescribe, and Congress cannot change their nature or object. But whenever within the limits of the Constitution a road becomes necessary for the purposes of the General Government, Congress may authorize its construction. The gentleman who last spoke refers to the power of Congress to regulate commerce. Congress has the right to say that upon such and such terms goods may pass from New York to New Jersey, or shall not pass. But Congress has not the right to say that certain individuals shall carry at certain rates; it has not the right to lay its hand upon any man owning a horse and wagon, and say you shall carry goods at such and such a rate. It cannot, without compensation, seize certain wharves in New Jersey and devote them to purposes not sanctioned by the owners. It can prescribe terms of intercourse, but it cannot interfere with individual rights in so doing.

My design in speaking at all was to call the attention of the House to a distinction between the extreme views expressed upon the one side and the other of this proposition, and to insist that the bill which I originally introduced, and which was to provide for a grand highway between New York and Washington as an original act, is the only mode by which Congress can secure both objects.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. It is known to gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House that I have not had an opportunity of hearing much that has been said either for or against the passage of this bill. If, therefore, I travel out of the usual line of debate, and shall fail to answer the principal arguments heretofore advanced in its favor, I am not without apology.

I take up the subject as I find it upon my file, and proceed to give the reasons which shall govern my vote against the bill.

The bill declares:

That the railroad of the Camden and Atlantic Rail Company, and the branches thereof built and to be built, and the railroad of the Raritan and Delaware Bay Rail Company, and the branches thereof built and to be built, are hereby declared to be lawful structures and public highways of the United States.

That the said railroad and branches, with a ferry or ferries from Camden, in the State of New Jersey, to Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, and steamboats and other vessels from Port Monmouth, in the State of New Jersey, to the city of New York, running in connection with said roads, are hereby established and recognized as a post route, military road, and public highway of the United States for the purpose of transmission of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States, and for the transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise of foreign growth across the State of New Jersey, under permits granted by the collectors of ports of the United States authorized to grant the same, and for commerce among and between the several States of the United States.

And undertakes to grant:

That the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company, and the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, chartered by the State of New Jersey, or either of them, or their assigns, are hereby authorized and empowered to complete, maintain, and operate the said railroads and branches, and to establish, maintain, and run the said ferries, steamboats, and other vessels as a line of transportation for goods, wares, and merchandise of all descriptions, and passengers between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, and between the intermediate places and said cities, respectively, and for commerce between and among the several States of the United States, anything in any law or laws of the above-named States to the contrary notwithstanding.

The first question that naturally arises is, why this proposed action of the Congress of the United States? Why this interference by the United States Government in a matter so clearly within the exclusive jurisdiction of the State of New Jersey? A State which is still admitted, I believe, to be a sovereign State of this Union, one of the old thirteen that made the Union, and therefore one of the original pillars upon which our fathers erected the grand superstructure of all our national greatness; and I know of no State in the Union that has so outgrown her original proportions as to have either absorbed any of the powers, immunities, or attributes of that State or crushed her in any way into a smaller compass than she is entitled as a sovereign State to occupy. She still has her Senators in the other branch of Congress, and I observe some gentlemen on this floor who are still recognized as coming from the State of New Jersey. In the history of my country I find that my native State still occupies the proud position of having been the battle-field of the Revolution, and during the present war, although she has less of the responsibility of bringing it on than perhaps any other, yet with fewer general officers in proportion to her population and the number of soldiers sent, the footsteps, the graves, and the crimson of her soldiers mark the progress of our armies in victory and in defeat wherever the national banner has been thrown to the breeze. And as a Pennsylvanian I have not forgotten with what alacrity—less than one year ago—her Governor and her sons responded to the call of my State, and sent us regiment after regiment to defend us against the ravages of the invader, and that while our Governor was waiting for permission to call out his own militia. She proved to our satisfaction then that she was not only a sovereign State, but that her Governor and her sons were loyal and patriotic citizens, ready at a moment's warning to discharge their whole duty to the Union and to the citizens of her sister States.

If I go to the office of the Provost Marshal General I find that she has responded to every call that has been made upon her for men and money; and I believe she is the only one of the old thirteen that has not suffered a draft, but has promptly filled every call for men with volunteers. If I recur to the rolls of her enactments, I find that early in the war she provided by law for most ample bounties to her soldiers, and at the same time provided by fixed appropriations for a liberal support of the families of her volunteers. Yet in the face of all these things I find the Congress of the United States gravely considering the propriety, not of seizing or authorizing the seizure of one of her thoroughfares for military and postal purposes, nor complaining that their use for such purposes has been refused, but after having used them from the commencement of the war up to this time, it is now proposed to declare certain detached railroad and steamboat routes public highways, and to grant to them certain powers, franchises, and privileges, to be exercised and enjoyed by them in spite of the constitution and laws of that State, as well as of the States of New York and Pennsylvania, upon which this route terminates. Is there anything in the charters of these companies that makes them private roads? Are they not already public highways? And can there be anything in the track of these steamboats in and under the brine of the Atlantic that requires congressional legislation to make them public highways—tracks and routes threatened by the privateers of the southern confederacy? By what authority does Congress propose to make these seizures and to grant these franchises?

Gentlemen say it is a military necessity; they want this route to transport troops, supplies, and the mails, so as the better to enable the Government to carry on the war. Have we any troops, supplies, or mails that we cannot transport over the Camden and Amboy or the New Jersey Central railroad? Do we expect to have such large quantities of these in the future that other roads will be needed to transport them in addition to those already built? What war are we about to be engaged in that will require such immense quantities of troops and supplies? I had hoped from the promises of the party in power that the rebellion was about being crushed out and the war soon to close, or at least that the demand for troops and supplies in the future would not be half so great as it has been in the past. If it be so, then I ask why this uneasiness as to our ability to transport all that we shall need? We have already granted, so far as we could grant authority to the military to seize and run any railroads in the Union found necessary for military purposes, an authority which the Executive had as much right to exercise, and more, than we to grant. The executive branch of the Government has as much power growing out of public military necessity as Congress can possibly have, neither being able to go beyond an absolute and immediate necessity. But what troops is it proposed to transport over this route, and to what destination? Is it expected that the battle-fields of the rebellion are to be transferred from the South to the East? Or is Massachusetts about to "swarm" with soldiers marching to the field, according to the ancient promise of her Governor? Are Greeley's "nine hundred thousand strong" about to move? Or are we about to be involved in a war with some foreign Power that may land their forces on the shores of New England? If the latter, I would suggest that some route for the transportation of our troops be selected which is more inland than the one proposed. It seems to me that in such an event no prudent commander would risk the transportation of his armies upon steamboats so liable to be demolished by the iron-clads and gunboats of a maritime foe.

Some two years ago I had the honor to report from the Committee on Roads and Canals a proposition to give to the Reading and Columbia railroad, in Pennsylvania, some governmental aid to enable it to be the more speedily completed so as to form the connecting link of a most direct inland route from Baltimore to New York. Part of the road was then graded, and my plan was for the Government to advance to the company the cash for her first mortgage bonds issued by State authority, so fast as the road should be graded and the track laid.

This route led from Baltimore by the way of York, Columbia, Reading, and Easton in Pennsylvania, over the New Jersey Central railroad to New York. It was not proposed to either add to or take from any of these roads their chartered franchises. This was at a time when the peace of the United States and Great Britain had just been jeopardized by the Trent affair. This proposition was based upon the fact that between Baltimore and Philadelphia, at Bush Creek, Gunpowder, and Havre-de-Grace, a maritime foe might break our communication, and it was abandoned because it was found there was no encouragement unless the friends of the measure would consent to "log-roll" with the Illinois ship canal and several other military necessities of a similar character. That road is now in running order, and will be formally opened in a few days, and then, as the report in that case shows, we will have a perfect and direct inland route from this city to New York, so far removed from the seaboard as to be out of all danger from an invading foe. The military necessity, then, was to avoid the coast and the inlets, bays, and arms along it. Now, however, the military necessity has changed, and these are represented as the safer routes. These conclusions are fairly drawn from the bill and the arguments in favor of its passage.

But, sir, it seems to me that so far from there being any military necessity for the passage of this bill and the establishment of this route, there is not even a military pretext in its favor, and that the route, if established, will be found so inconvenient and dangerous as to prevent its being ever used for such purposes.

I can hardly believe, therefore, that this project has the sanction of any military authority, excepting it to be the camp-followers, contractors, and stock-jobbers, who hang round the capital seeking new sources of plunder and speculation. I regret, sir, to observe the partisan spirit that in some respects has characterized the debate upon this question by the advocates of the bill. If we were permitted to judge by the manner and temper with which the Camden and Amboy railroad and the State of New Jersey have been assailed, we might infer that the establishing of this route was expected to run the stock of that road out of the market and to knock the bottom out of the State of New Jersey entirely.

The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] while speaking against the right of the States the other day to tax the dividend and property of the national banks for State and municipal purposes, took occasion to assail the State of New Jersey by referring to that State as one that would be likely to attempt to tax these favored and privileged institutions out of existence. He spoke in the most contemptuous manner of State sovereignty, and threatened the people of the free North, if they objected to this new congressional currency, with the devastations of Virginia. It was a fit thing, sir, that this tirade against State rights and State sovereignty should come from one who is so largely indebted to the overthrow of State sovereignty for all the public positions he has ever held, whose State has become a mere dependency upon the General Government and whose people have become the subjects of a sort of viceroy.

If I read the history of Baltimore aright, the gentleman did not come to Congress until the laws of his State had been set at defiance by the Plug Uglies, Black Snakes, and Blood Tubs of his district, nor again until the popular will had been overawed by Federal bayonets. Had New Jersey ever allowed to be enacted within her border the scenes that have disgraced the soil of Maryland, she might very properly be held to the opprobrium and contempt of all honorable men. New Jersey is one of the most law-abiding States in the Union to-day, and always has been true to herself, to her people, and to the General Government. She allows no conscript to fight the battle of the General Government for her, nor does she allow one class of her citizens to either sell or steal from another to exempt her from her military obligations. There was a State of Maryland once, and her people were free, and she was represented by statesmen in Congress. Were those statesmen here now she might regain her former proud position. If she had her virtue yet her honor might be restored. Then she made grants and ceded a portion of her territory to the General Government by well-defined limits. Now the General Government overrides her State boundaries, crushes out her State government, and absorbs the whole State under the domination of the District of Columbia. This is the kind of spirit that demands the passage of this bill, and yet the measure finds favor with honorable gentlemen representing sovereign States on this floor.

Some gentlemen exclaim against the payment of the ten cents through passenger tax imposed by the State of New Jersey upon this company, and hurl their anathemas upon the company for paying it. We pay a similar tax on the Philadelphia and Baltimore road, yet the gentlemen propose to connect their new route with this road and make no complaint. If it be answered that the free ticket of the member obviates the difficulty in this case, I reply that the member's constituent is not thus favored. To have to pay ten cents because of this doctrine of State rights, exclaimed the amiable gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLOGG] the other day, is an outrage. Ten cents! exclaims another; a gross outrage! Why, Mr. Speaker, I had no idea there were so many ten-cent "Jimmys" on the intensely loyal side of the House. And I would be much gratified if some gentleman would inform me what sort of a military necessity it is that proposes to relieve a member of Congress from the payment of ten cents.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have hastily reviewed this question in its national bearings, and finding nothing that would warrant me in doing so much violence to my conscience as to vote for this bill, let me for a few moments call attention to it as a practical work of internal improvement. Let us view this question stripped of all the embarrassments we are under because of the want of constitutional authority in the General Government to legislate upon matters so exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States as the granting of charters of incorporation and corporate franchises to railroad companies is.

The trade of the United States, especially since the breaking out of the rebellion, is between the East and the West and through the middle States in those directions; and if this war is continued much longer under the present plan of prosecuting it and for its present purposes, this generation will never behold any other channels of trade in the United States. There are three great thoroughfares which carry this trade and travel. The one is the northern thoroughfare, and is composed of the New York and Erie canal, the New York and Erie and the New York Central railroads, and their connections east and west. Another of these is the southern thoroughfare, leading over the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and the Pennsylvania railroad to Philadelphia, and thence by the Camden and Amboy and the New Jersey railroad to New York; while a third is that which is now being rapidly developed and carries part of the trade and travel of the Pennsylvania railroad and the Philadelphia and Erie railroad over the Lebanon Valley, the East Pennsylvania, the Lehigh Valley, and New Jersey Central railroad to New York. The completion of the Morris and Essex railroad from Hackettstown, New Jersey, to Easton, Pennsylvania, now under contract, will relieve the New Jersey Central railroad of some of the burdens imposed upon it, in addition to those of the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western railroad. These two roads in New Jersey will soon carry the bituminous coal of the West and the anthracite coal of the Schuylkill, the Lehigh, and the Luzerne coal-fields to New York and the East. Add to these the connection now being completed from Baltimore to Reading, and there is made up one of the grandest thoroughfares of trade and travel in the world.

As a Representative of the Lehigh valley I can perceive that it might be the interest of some of my constituents to support this measure, for the reason that while the route it proposes to establish can amount to very little, with its dangers, ferries, and reshipments, yet its establishment will be, as I believe it is intended to be, a blow at the Camden and Amboy railroad, which will result in damaging the southern thoroughfare, and incidentally benefiting the middle or central route, in which some of my people are interested.

Philadelphians will oppose this measure because of its tendency to destroy their most reliable through route. No bridge can ever be erected for railroad cars to cross at that city, without a draw, and no draw could be used for the cars because the vessels would keep it constantly open. The route would then have two ferries between Philadelphia and New York, if that up the New York bay can be called a ferry. By the Camden and Amboy railroad there is a bridge at Trenton, and Philadelphians know that it would be better for them, instead of contributing to the annoyance of this company, to encourage them to lay additional tracks, so that the volume of trade and travel between their city and New York may be swelled to its utmost extent. The interests of Philadelphia in this respect are the interests of Baltimore, and so of all cities and persons interested in the Pennsylvania railroad, which, by the Philadelphia route, carries New York trade and travel one hundred and six miles further than if that trade and travel left that road at Harrisburg and took the direct central route to that city; and the Philadelphia and Erie, being owned in part by the Pennsylvania Central, is identified with the interests of that road.

In this respect I find myself and my colleagues from the Lehigh and Berks districts differently situated from gentlemen representing the East and the West, whose interests lie in keeping all these great thoroughfares open and in competition with each other. If by this measure Philadelphia could secure such an enlargement of their facilities for trade and travel with New York as to draw off the trade and travel from the valleys of the central route, they would then be expected to favor it, and we to oppose. But it promises no such thing; whether so intended or not it will and must result only in embarrassment and annoyance to the only reliable route between those two great cities, and to the extent that the measure succeeds will Philadelphia be the loser in the end; and whatever that city loses the State will also lose. Hence my people are always interested in the success of our large cities, for their growth and wealth and power add to the wealth of the State, and lighten the burdens upon the rural districts.

I shall therefore vote against this bill, not so much because of any interest that may be involved in it as because of the want of authority in the Constitution to entertain it, and the dangerous precedent its passage will establish.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded me the remainder of his hour.

Mr. STILES. If the gentleman from New York will yield, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think we might as well finish this bill this evening. We have had an unusually full discussion, and I think it is time it was brought to a close.

Mr. STILES. Does the gentleman desire to take a vote this evening?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do.

Mr. PRUYN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that several members are anxious to leave the House to look after sick and wounded soldiers, and it is questionable whether we shall have a quorum here much longer. A gentleman upon the other side of the House has just asked me to pair off with him for that purpose. I do not think we shall have a quorum to vote upon this bill to-night.

Mr. SCHENCK. Probably the absentees will be about the same on either side. I do not propose to occupy but about ten minutes' time.

Mr. PRUYN. How much time have I remaining of the gentleman's hour?

The SPEAKER. About thirty-four minutes.

Mr. STILES. I insist upon my motion to adjourn.

NEW NAVY-YARD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withhold his motion for the purpose of enabling me to make a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, merely for the purpose of having it printed.

Mr. STILES. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, in response to a resolution of the House instructing them to inquire into and report upon the expediency of the establishment of a new navy-yard for the construction, docking, and repair of iron-clad and other vessels, and the proper site for its location. All I ask is that it be printed.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I do not object to the reception of the report, but I do not see my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] in his seat, and I know he is preparing a minority report, and I wish the two reports to go together.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I include that in my motion to print.

The report of the committee, together with the views of the minority, was then ordered to be printed.

Mr. STILES. I now renew my motion to adjourn, and demand tellers upon it.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STILES and NORTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 63.

So the House refused to adjourn.

RAILROADS TO NEW YORK.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] having yielded for the motion to adjourn has lost his right to the floor, or at least that the time occupied by these proceedings in relation to the adjournment will be deducted from his hour.

The SPEAKER. It will not. The Chair will have a passage from the Manual read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"A motion for adjournment cannot be made while a member is speaking, but, according to the practice, a member speaking may yield for a motion to adjourn, or that the committee rise, without losing his right to the floor when the subject is resumed."

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, this discussion has already covered so much ground and some portions of the subject have been so entirely exhausted that I intend to pass by points upon which I should otherwise have spoken, and to confine myself to some views of the question which I think the House ought to consider.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. With the permission of my colleague, I desire to make a suggestion. It is apparent, I think, that no vote can be taken upon this question to-night, and I hope it will be understood that it shall be discussed this afternoon but not voted on, to the end that members who wish to leave and visit the hospitals may do so. I am one of those who desire to leave for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think there is an opportunity now of bringing to a close a long-continued debate upon a subject that ought to be got out of the way to make room for other business. I therefore prefer to go on.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] endeavored this morning to draw a distinction between the use of an existing road and the authority to build a new road. It strikes me that there can be nothing solid in such a distinction. It is intended by the original bill and also by the substitute offered to-day to give this company powers which it does not now possess. They came here for some object or purpose. If we can give them one power we can give them several. If we can give one we can give all which may be necessary for the successful prosecution of their business. If we can authorize an enlargement of their business, we of necessity give them the power to procure the additional facilities and to acquire the property, both real and personal, which they may need for that purpose. If we can do all this, it is quite clear that we could authorize the original construction of the road. The distinction made by the gentleman from Ohio is not therefore, in my judgment, a sound one.

I do not propose to discuss the rights of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, except as they come up incidentally. I do not intend to defend or to attack the legislation of New Jersey in reference to that company or in reference to the Raritan road, which is now under consideration. My principal object, within the short time allowed me, is to call the attention of the House to the question whether it is expedient, even if we have the power, to grant what is now asked for. Is it desirable to aid any company in carrying out what I believe to be, from the papers before me, to which I shall presently refer, an act of bad faith on their part in coming to this Congress to ask for these additional privileges? I beg to call the attention of the House to two or three extracts, which bear on this view of the case, from the opinion of the chancellor of New Jersey, whose high character and integrity are conceded on all sides of the House. The Camden and Amboy Railroad Company filed a bill in the court of chancery of New Jersey, the principal object of which was to restrain the Raritan Bay Railroad Company from the use of their road for certain purposes of traffic. The chancellor of New Jersey, in advertising to the position taken by the defendants in that case in their answer, says:

"They deny that any agreement has been made or is intended to be made for the transportation of freight or passengers between the cities of New York and Philadelphia. They admit that they and the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company have in view the construction and perpetuating, by means of their respective railroads and a convenient connection between them, of a continuous and convenient line of railway communication across New Jersey, from the city of Camden to Port Monmouth, but they deny that they or any of them have in view the continuation of said line, at either end thereof, by steamboat transportation to the cities of New York and Philadelphia, for the purpose of using the same for the transportation of passengers or merchandise in a manner which will violate any contract between the State and the complainants, or any provisions of the acts of the Legislature referred to in the complainants' bill. They also deny that any contract or arrangement made by them is calculated or intended to form a continuous line of railway communication between the said cities, to compete in business with the business of the complainants, contrary to their vested rights. They admit that it is possible, if not prohibited by law, that a line of communication by railroad and steamboat between the cities of New York and Philadelphia might be opened, but they say that their railroad is not a public highway and cannot so be used without their concurrence and consent, and as they have made no arrangement whatsoever so to use the same, and do not intend any unlawful use of their road, such use, if unlawful, cannot be made, and if attempted, can be restrained by the courts. They also deny that they intend in any way to violate the chartered rights of the complainants, or that they intend during their existence to violate any of the alleged exclusive privileges of the complainants. And the defendants, all and each of them, declare that it is not and never has been their intention by the construction of their railroad, or its connections with the Camden and Atlantic railroad, or otherwise, to interfere with the complainants' chartered rights by competing with the railroad of the complainants by the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia or otherwise."

It is thus shown, Mr. Speaker, that the gentlemen representing these two railroad companies, together forming the Raritan bay line, came into the court of chancery of New Jersey and declared, under oath, that they did not intend, during their existence, to violate any of the alleged exclusive privileges of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. Under such circumstances, with such a record, these gentlemen appear here and ask Congress to empower them to do that which they have already solemnly declared they did not intend to do. I claim that it does not become us to aid any corporation which presents itself before us under such circumstances.

It will be borne in mind—as the gentleman from Wisconsin has already stated to the House—that this proposed line is not part of a shorter line between Washington and New York, which it is proposed to construct, and toward which many gentlemen of this House have expressed favorable views. In fact, it is a much longer line of communication between Philadelphia and New York than the existing line. The difference in point of time, I believe, would probably be one to two hours as compared with the line by way of New Brunswick.

This bill is not asked for, therefore, for the purpose of facilitating the passage of the mails, but simply on the ground that it may aid the operations of the Government in the transportation of troops and munitions of war. It is quite enough for us to know that, so far as the present lines of railway are concerned, it is shown by affidavits here—copies of which have been submitted very generally to the members of the House—that those lines of railway, under the most extraordinary emergency that the country has ever known or perhaps ever will know, were amply able and were prepared to do everything that the Government required them to do in transporting troops and munitions of war across New Jersey.

The Postmaster General in answer to a resolution of the Senate of 22d December last, requiring information in regard to the failures of the mail between Washington and New York city, communicated a letter to that body in which he discussed the question whether the transportation of the mails between Washington and New York could be facilitated by a new line of railroad. He came to the conclusion that a new line of road was not needed by the Government. Now, if not needed for facilitating the transportation of the mails, certainly it cannot be alleged that there is anything due on that score to the application now before us. The views presented by the Postmaster General on postal communication by what is called an air line between the two cities bear generally upon the policy of granting the application before us. I will read an extract from the letter referred to. The Postmaster General says:

"It is not considered that any legislation is necessary to secure more satisfactory mail service on this line [between Washington and New York] or that any such action could effect the object, unless it should be such as would give the Department power to control to some extent the action of the railroad companies carrying the mail, in the matter of changes of the time of running the mail trains."

Now, sir, let me ask the House—and I desire to address myself to the candid consideration of gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber who are the Representatives from the different States upon this floor—whether it is desirable, whether it is judicious on the part of the Government, even if we have the power, to trample down the rights of New Jersey by stopping in and interfering with her legislation, granting powers which she has refused to a corporation of her own creation? She chartered the corporation which now comes before you with this application. She gave it certain powers and privileges, and refused to give it that which is now asked for it at your hands. Shall we, in view of the action of that State and the solemn protest against this measure which has been sent to us by her Legislature, force it upon her, even if we have the power to do it? Are we justified in totally disregarding this declaration of New Jersey? Is it wise for us to do that which she believes, and which her citizens almost without exception believe, to be a violation of their constitutional privileges?

The Legislature of New Jersey, acting on the message of the Governor on the 23d of March last, passed certain concurrent resolutions by which, after calling attention to the pendency of this measure, and to the fact that the chancellor of that State had decided that the assumption by the two railroads forming the Raritan bay line of the powers which this bill proposes to confer upon them would be a direct violation of the laws of that State, protested against the passage of the bill before us. The last resolution is the only one to which I will refer. It is as follows:

"4. Because such special legislation, aimed only at New Jersey, would be a wanton insult to the dignity of the State, in derogation of her reserved rights, and in violation of the contracts she has made, and which have been pronounced by the courts to be constitutional and binding."

I believe these resolutions were passed almost without a dissenting voice, and demand from us that respectful consideration which is due to one of the most gallant and loyal States of the Union. Now, sir, let us see how carefully the Constitution has watched over the rights of the States in respect to the appropriation of any part of their soil for public purposes. In the very section of the Constitution (section eight of the first article) which contains the clause now quoted in favor of the passage of the pending bill—I mean: the commerce clause, as it is usually called—we find the following among the enumerated powers granted to Congress:

"To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district—not exceeding ten miles square—as may by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

It may be said that this has reference to exclusive legislation, but it nevertheless illustrates the principle. It has, I believe, been the almost uniform course with the States, when granting exclusive jurisdiction to the United States over lands acquired for any of the purposes referred to in the Constitution, to reserve the right to serve process issuing out of the State courts within the bounds of the grant. Now the nature of the use made by railroad companies of real estate is necessarily almost exclusive, very nearly as much so as that of the Government in the cases referred to. While, therefore, in respect to land required for the building of forts, magazines, arsenals, and dockyards, all public and national purposes, it is expressly provided that the Government shall only acquire jurisdiction with the consent of the State in which such real estate is situated, can it be claimed that Congress has the larger power to authorize the appropriation of real estate within a State for the use of a railroad corporation without the consent of the State, and indeed as in this case against its protest? Now, I believe it has never been known in the history of this Government, I think there is no case on record in which Congress has purchased real estate for national purposes unless the State in which the property was situated had first given its assent and ceded the jurisdiction which it possessed.

Now, sir, is the settled policy of the Government in this respect to be overturned? Are we now to abandon the course which has been pursued for seventy-five years and enter upon a new one, not for public purposes, or but remotely so, and that against the unqualified protest of the State interested? When the national road across the Alleghany mountains was authorized by Congress—a work of great public importance at the time—the statute expressly required that no part of the road should be constructed in any State without the consent of such State. Does not every reason which led to that enactment apply with increased force in this case? For the reasons thus briefly stated I claim, Mr. Speaker, that if we have the right to pass a law of the kind now asked for it is inexpedient to do so.

What must be the result if we adopt this measure? The new line requiring more time than the old for the transit of passengers, will probably offer to carry them at a reduced rate. That compels the existing road to do one of two things: either to reduce its through fare, or to purchase the stock of this corporation and thus obtain the control of its affairs. That the last will be the practical result is almost certain. And these gentlemen who come here asking an authority which was refused by the Legislature of New Jersey, will thus, in virtue of our action, be enabled to work out their purposes.

If we are to believe the depositions placed before the House of gentlemen who stand as high for personal veracity as any in the country, we are satisfactorily informed that the existing line can do all the through business. Looking, then, at the result which I have indicated and which it seems to me is sure to happen, no public benefit can arise from the passage of this bill.

I have now done with the question of expediency. As my time is nearly out I can only say a few words on the constitutional question as to the power of Congress in regard to internal improvements which has so long divided the people of this country. Judge Story, in his treatise on the Constitution, points out the position of both parties in regard to it and gives a summary of their respective views. I will read one extract from section twelve hundred and seventy-two only:

"The resistance to this extended reach of the national powers turns also upon the same general reasoning by which a strict construction of the Constitution has been constantly maintained. It is said that such a power is not among those enumerated in the Constitution, nor is it implied as a means of executing any of them. The power to regulate commerce cannot include a power to construct roads and canals and improve the navigation of water-courses in order to facilitate, promote, and secure such commerce without a latitude of construction, departing from the ordinary import of the terms, and incompatible with the nature of the Constitution."

How careful Congress was in the outset in exercising any power over the subject of internal improvements, I have already stated in referring to the national, or, as it was often called, the Cumberland road. The consent of the States through which the road was to pass was made absolutely requisite before it could be constructed within their respective limits.

President Monroe, in stating his views on this subject in 1822, denies the right of Congress to construct works of internal improvement, but asserts the right to appropriate money in aid of such objects. That is, if a State has determined that a public work is necessary; if it enters upon that work, if Congress think it one of national importance and interest, and for the benefit not only of the State immediately interested but the surrounding States, in that case Congress may appropriate money to aid the work.

President Monroe was, I believe, understood to incline to a broad construction of the commerce clause of the Constitution—and his views on the subject should command high respect from those who hold to that construction—but it will be seen that he insisted that the State should first act, that it should first determine upon the expediency of the proposed improvement, and that Congress might then give its aid, but without giving to it the management of the work.

Let us go no further than this. Permit New Jersey to pass upon this question, and let us abide by her judgment.

I should like to say more on this subject, but as my time is about to expire I yield the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. It seems to me that this subject has occupied sufficiently the attention of the House. The debate has been protracted, and a full opportunity has been given for hearing the arguments and statements of gentlemen upon both sides of the question. Under other circumstances I might ask to be heard somewhat at length, as a representative of the Committee on Military Affairs, by which the bill was reported; but I shall content myself with a brief statement in their behalf of what I understand to be the points in question; refer to one or two extracts from documentary evidence in order to correct a misapprehension of facts, and then leave the matter without further discussion.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman desire to press this matter to a vote to-night?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do.

Gentlemen upon the other side of the House and upon this side who have opposed the passage of this bill have been disposed to look at it entirely from a New Jersey point of view. That was not the light in which the question was regarded by the Military Committee, nor is it the view I shall take in recording the vote I propose to give.

I shall be willing to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] because that commends itself to many gentlemen here on account of the general character of the legislation it proposes. But if that substitute should fail I will go with equal cheerfulness for the original bill, with a view to the correction of the particular evil at which that is aimed.

I look at this matter as the committee looked at it, from an outside point of view. I look at it as a citizen of Ohio or of any other State than New Jersey, and for that reason I will be drawn into no argument here in relation to the rights of natural or artificial persons as they exist under and by virtue of the laws of New Jersey. I care nothing about what questions may have been raised in the Legislature of New Jersey. I care not what may have been the different opinions of the courts of New Jersey. It is not for me, if the people of New Jersey are willing to submit to the dictation and rule of a selfish corporation, to interfere for the protection of that people. They must take care of themselves. They must be left to their own Legislature and their own courts.

We come to the consideration of this question simply as it affects the people of the other States, and we object to New Jersey or any other State passing any law or giving rights under the legislation of that State to any individual or corporation which shall interfere with the free and unrestricted exercise of those rights which we claim under the general and common Constitution of the land. And it is because New Jersey has undertaken to say that there shall be no trade across her limits from Philadelphia to New York or from New York to Philadelphia, except upon certain conditions which she prescribes, one of which is to give the monopoly of the trade and travel to a particular company, that we object to all that as an interference with rightful intercommunication between the States.

I do not, therefore, look at this in any degree as a question affecting only a single State. It is in the view of the matter which we have taken as citizens of the United States that we have been induced to think that some corrective legislation is necessary. Anybody who claims the rights of a citizen of the United States, among which is the privilege of going through the country across any particular State, must be deeply interested in the question whether the transit through that State for all purposes shall be free and unrestrained.

That there is a monopoly and obstruction to free trade through New Jersey I suppose is hardly to be disputed. Without arguing that, I will simply call the attention of the House to the formal admission of it made by the Legislature of that State to prove that this must be accepted as a fact. Mark the language of the preamble of the act by which the monopoly was extended in 1854:

"Whereas by reason of existing contracts between the State of New Jersey and the Delaware and Raritan Canal Company and the Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Company, as set forth in their acts of incorporation and the other acts in relation to said companies, they are possessed of certain exclusive privileges which prevent the construction, except by their consent, of any railroad or railroads in this State, which shall be intended or used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, or to compete in business with the railroads of said companies; and whereas the extinguishment of these privileges is a matter of great public importance."

Even by solemn statute, therefore, these charter privileges are declared to be a monopoly, and it is because it is such that we propose to interfere for the benefit of all the States. It is what should have been done long ago.

One of the effects of that monopoly has been to impose burdens, not upon the people of New Jersey, but upon the people of other States, and therefore we want this obstruction out of the way. This has been denied. Gentlemen have contended here that there is no obstruction, that there is no imposition practiced upon the people of other States, or at least that there is no difference made between the rights conceded to them in their transit through New Jersey, or in their transportation of freight through that State, and those conceded to the people of New Jersey. But unfortunately for that statement, here is more documentary evidence. In 1841 John S. Darcy, president of the New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company, made a statement which accompanied the message of the then Governor, William Pennington, to the Legislature, as a part of the history of the relation of this railroad monopoly to the people and State of New Jersey. In that explanation he says to the Governor, and through him to the Legislature:

"With a view, then, to ascertain the intentions of that body, permit us to state that it seems plain from the acts incorporating these companies, and the testimony of those best conversant with the history of their incorporations, that it was the policy of the State, taking advantage of the geographical position of New Jersey, between the two largest States and cities of the Union, to create a revenue by imposing tax or transit duty upon every person who should pass on the railroad across the State, between these cities, from the Delaware river to the Raritan bay; but that it was not their design to impose any tax upon citizens of their own State for traveling between intermediate places."

That is to say, "we want New Jersey to understand that although we have a monopoly it is not a monopoly of which New Jersey ought to complain, for our object is to raise revenue for the State by imposing this tax on the citizens and business coming from the other States."

This document, it is true, was not intended to be used in Congress or outside of New Jersey. It was supposed that it would serve its purpose by communicating the views and intentions of these monopolists to the Legislature of their own State in order that they might secure additional privileges and advantages. But it was not supposed that any one outside of the borders of New Jersey would see the document, or seeing it would take exception to it.

I read further from the same communication:

"It should be remembered, too, that it never has been the policy of New Jersey legislation to exact a transit duty from her own citizens, or from persons visiting her towns and villages. Such an imposition would operate not only as a restraint on commerce and social intercourse within our territory, but would expose our own people to greater burdens, by compelling an increase of charge corresponding to the amount paid to the State, and thus unequally tax the traveling portion of our citizens."

"The company believe that a careful consideration of the whole matter, as well from the provisions of the charter as from a recurrence to the period when it was granted, will produce the conviction that the transit duty was intended to be levied only on citizens of other States passing through New Jersey."

That means, "we want money to reimburse ourselves, but not from the citizens of New Jersey. We want you to understand, Mr. Governor and gentlemen of the Legislature, that it is only intended to tax the 'outside barbarians.'"

Well, now, New Jersey must not complain if these "outside barbarians," claiming to have some interest in this common Government of ours, should object, even now, at this late hour, to that monopoly, or any such monopoly in any State, being continued for the purpose of building up interests there, at the expense of everybody else.

Sir, I do not wonder that there should be a howl from New Jersey, or that gentlemen who speak upon this subject from the New Jersey standpoint should say, as the gentleman who has just closed has said, that we are proposing to trample upon the rights of that State. But has it occurred to those gentlemen that while we are not trampling upon the rights of the citizens of that State, if we do not take the ground that they shall not build up these exclusive and privileged monopolies for the benefit of their own State, we shall recognize their right to trample upon the constitutional privileges of all the citizens of all the other States?

My colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] in arguing the question this morning suggested a doubt whether the charter held by the monopoly had ever been construed by the courts of New Jersey as going to the extent of preventing other roads from doing any through business between Philadelphia and New York, or whether the courts of that State had gone so far as to require any other company which did do such through business to pay over the proceeds to the monopolists.

Now, I read from the statement of the case made by Mr. Joseph P. Bradley, the very respectable attorney of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, a printed statement and argument in the case which was submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs when the subject was under their consideration. In that paper, purporting to give a history of the whole matter, there occur several passages which I would gladly read if I had time; but I will confine myself to a single extract.

Mr. Bradley says:

"The complainants finding that the defendants or some company with their consent and procurement were carrying freight and passengers over their road, and that such freight and passengers were taken through from New York to Philadelphia, filed a supplemental bill charging these facts and demanding the interposition of the court."

"The defendants filed answers, in which they admit that through freight and passengers were carried across their road, but put themselves on the ground that it was done by others, by the Philadelphia and Eastern Transportation Company, the Union Transportation Company, the Importers and Traders' Dispatch Company, &c., and that said companies made their own arrangements with the steam and ferry-boats at each end of the line. But it appeared that the defendants knew of the business which these companies expected to do, made arrangements with them in reference to it, and that the directors of the Raritan and Delaware Company owned the steamboats at the New York end, &c. They also admit that they had carried through passengers, including some seventeen or eighteen thousand troops; also that they had carried other Government freight, for which they alleged, but never proved, an order of the Secretary of War. They put themselves on the ground that they only carried freight or passengers part of the way; and it was none of their business where they came from or where going to.

"Proofs were taken and the cause was argued on final hearing in November and December last. The chancellor gave his decision on the 3d of February instant. He sustained the claim of the plaintiffs as to the through business, declared that the defendants were infringing that right, ordered an injunction to prevent their doing it in future, and decreed that they should account to the plaintiffs for the business they had done."

I only quote that in order to show what has been the unrelenting character of this monopoly, and what has been understood by the courts and Legislature as the exclusive privileges granted.

Mr. PENDLETON. I suppose the gentleman referred to the statement which I made this morning.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir. I understood you to take that ground.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say that I read from the opinion of the chancellor of 3d February, 1864, in which he orders a master to take an account of all the through passengers and freight carried on these roads. The chancellor says:

"It will be referred to a master to take an account of all the through passengers and freight which have been carried over the road since the opening of the route; and also all damages which the complainants have sustained thereby. In taking the account the master will include all the soldiers, horses, baggage, and munitions of war that have been transported, distinguishing this part of the account from ordinary business."

"No proof has been offered in support of the allegation of the answer that they were carried over the roads of the defendants by orders of the Secretary of War, or by orders of the General Government. Should it appear before the master that any such orders were made he will report the evidence thereon, and the disposition of that part of the case will be reserved till the coming in of the report."

I am informed that up to this time that report has not been made, and therefore there has been no adjudication on that part of the case. It was on the authority of that opinion, which I suppose is correctly printed, that I made the statement.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have the statement of the whole case by Joseph P. Bradley, the counsel in the case.

Mr. PENDLETON. I read from what purports to be the opinion of the chancellor.

Mr. SCHENCK. He simply says here that the chancellor sustained the claim of the plaintiffs as to the through business, and ordered an injunction to prevent this being done in future, and decreed that they should account to the plaintiffs for the business they had done. It appears from the report that the chancellor only required an account to be taken; but will my colleague or any one else tell me why an account should be taken? An account of the business of other railroads is not directed to be taken without an object. But on the supposition that another railroad was interfering with the exclusive privileges of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, an account is ordered to ascertain how much must be decreed to be paid over.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. This account was ordered to be taken for the transportation of Government supplies. As to everything else the receipts were ordered to be paid over. That is the difference.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will the gentleman tell me why it was that authority was given to the master to ascertain whether or not these troops and munitions of war were carried by the authority or under the orders of the War Department, if it was the intention to decree a payment absolutely?

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose, having the explanation furnished by the gentleman from Vermont, that the reason was this: the chancellor said to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, "I recognize you as a monopoly; it is held that you have exclusive privileges under the legislation of New Jersey. And so far as other companies have carried freight or transported passengers belonging to the trade or travel of the people of Ohio, Vermont, New York, California, or other parts of the Union passing across New Jersey, I decree that the proceeds shall be paid over to you absolutely; but so far as those other companies may have carried for the Government under military orders, perhaps they have been compelled in some way to do it, and I reserve that branch of the case for future decision." Leaving out of view, then, entirely what that decision may be in regard to transportation for the Government, the fact still remains that the court in New Jersey has required everything else in the shape of profits to other roads for through business to be paid over. So I am not mistaken in my statement in respect to the exclusive privileges held by the chancellor to belong to the Camden and Amboy road, and the exclusive jurisdiction which the State of New Jersey assumed to exercise for the benefit of the individual interests of its people, and against the interests of all the people of all the other States, through a monopoly of this kind. She will not allow the employment of any other means or mode of transportation by railroad, no matter how much cheaper or better it may be, through her territory. All are required to contribute to this monopoly.

Placing this question, then, precisely on the ground my colleague claims, the injustice still remains to just as great an extent against all the people of all the other States. This monstrous monopoly, as a distinct and substantive fact, remains without a contradiction or difference of opinion on the part of any gentleman who has addressed the House. It is not attempted to be contradicted even by the monopolists themselves.

Mr. PRUYN. There is one fact I should like information upon. The gentleman from Ohio read a short time since from a report made in 1841. That portion of the line which lies between New York and New Brunswick, it is charged, pays a percentage on each passenger carried over the line. If I am correctly informed the facts are these, that the line from Jersey City to New Brunswick pays to the State eight cents upon every dollar of gross receipts, in lieu of all other taxes; and that the other line by Trenton to New Brunswick also pays a percentage; and that it is paid alike for passengers residing in and out of the State.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think I understand the facts, and I do not mean again to be drawn off into a general round of explanation. It is a fact, as every one knows, that you may go through the State of New Jersey and pay from town to town, cheaper than you can go by purchasing a through ticket.

Mr. PRUYN. But you pay the same tax in either case.

Mr. SCHENCK. The president of the road says there is a distinction. He says that the tax is collected from citizens who live outside of the State. Of course, if a New Jerseyman goes over to Philadelphia and buys a ticket through to New York, he pays just as much to this monopoly as if he were not a New Jerseyman. The road does not go into an investigation when a passenger comes to purchase a ticket from New York to Philadelphia as to the particular State of which he is a citizen. There is no distinction made in that respect between a Jerseyman and a man from Ohio, Maine, or any other State. But then a Jerseyman does not ordinarily or often or ever go outside of the State to buy a ticket through the State. Persons from Ohio, Maine, and outsiders, therefore, who choose to go through the State of New Jersey, are the persons practically who pay the taxes. Thus the fact remains, as has already been stated, that in actual practice a tribute is levied by the State of New Jersey from the citizens of all the other States through the agency of this monopoly. And that is the reason why they are able to furnish railroad transportation proportionately cheaper between particular points within the State than for the entire route. The very creation of this corporation by its charter giving existence to these exclusive privileges was an interference with the rights of citizens of other States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Broomall] has said that the other route in question, the line of the Raritan and Delaware bay road, cannot be a competing route, because of its indirectness. I think it was my friend from Pennsylvania who denominated it "the elbow route." If it be a circuitous route, if it be an "elbow" route, we only propose to make that and other roads lawful lines of transit for the use of the people of the United States everywhere, leaving them to choose how far they will avail themselves of such convenience. If a road is so circuitous that it cannot be a competing road, then there is an end to any objection to it on the part of the monopoly. They say that it is a roundabout road, and that it can therefore do no harm to their road, and yet they want to put an end to it. We may set one part of this argument against the other, and there will be as little left of it as there was in the fight of the Kilkenny cats. [Laughter.]

But I have some documentary evidence in relation to that point in my hand. In this bill in chancery there were certain facts sworn to as reasons why another road should not be permitted to interfere with these exclusive privileges; and I will refer to some of them. The bill was accompanied by a statement prepared by the counsel, Mr. Bradley, and referred to in his argument. He says:

"I have a statement taken from a measurement of the map itself showing the distances and the speed which can be used. Steamboat distance from the Battery, New York, to South Amboy on Camden and Amboy line, 25 miles, which at 16 miles an hour (the usual rate of steamboats) would be 1 hour 34 minutes. Railroad distance from South Amboy to Camden 62½ miles, at 30 miles an hour, (which is about as much as trains on that route can make going through the villages and over bridges,) would be 2 hours 5 minutes. Ferry at Camden, 1 mile, 15 minutes—making a total of 88½ miles in 3 hours 54 minutes."

"Now take the Raritan and Delaware railroad route: steamboat distance from the Battery, New York, to Port Monmouth is 19 miles, at 16 miles an hour, 1 hour 11 minutes. Railroad distance from Port Monmouth to Camden, 92 miles, at 40 miles an hour, (which they could make on that line of country with a good line as easily as we could 30 miles,) would be 2 hours 18 minutes. Ferry at Camden, 15 minutes—making 3 hours 44 minutes. In other words, ten minutes short of our time."

They swear that the Raritan road is only sixteen miles longer than their road, and that notwithstanding it is sixteen miles longer the actual time of running over it is ten minutes less.

"But putting the speed of the Raritan and Delaware bay railroad and the Camden and Atlantic railroad and the speed of the Camden and Amboy railroad both at forty miles an hour, which would reduce our time thirty-one minutes, the time on the defendants' route would be only twenty-one minutes more than that of the Camden and Amboy. Well, to say that that would not be a competing line is to say nonsense—what we know to be nonsense."

Now mark that! Here for the purposes of argument in Congress it is claimed that the new route which we would declare lawful is a circuitous route; and if that be true then it is not a competing route. But then for the purpose of argument before the court it is alleged that the other route is so short as only to be sixteen miles longer than their own and is run over with such speed, because of the levelness of the country and the fewer stops made, that it takes ten minutes less time; and therefore it is perfect nonsense to say that it is not a competing route!

I have dwelt longer than I intended on these points, not for the purpose of opening the argument anew, but to correct in closing what seem to have been some misapprehensions of fact; and to place the merits of the proposed national legislation on what seems to me to be a true and unsailable ground of expediency and of right.

To put down or prevent all such State monopolies I am willing to go for the general substitute and apply it to the whole country. It was well, perhaps, that the bill as originally introduced looked only to the New Jersey case, because in the argument that furnished a striking illustration of the need for such general legislation, and though we vote now only to vindicate and sustain the rights of our own constituencies in other States, it cannot be long before all New Jerseymen will be grateful to us for helping to check the power of a selfish and grasping corporation which has for long years ruled and controlled their State with an iron hand.

I demand the previous question.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must decline to yield. Does the gentleman want to say that he did not call it the "elbow route?"

Mr. BROOMALL. I neither assent nor dissent to what I am not permitted to reply.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 66.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 67.

Mr. STILES demanded the yeas and nays.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, be and is hereby authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all freight, property, mails, passengers, troops, and Government supplies on their way from one State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 13, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ARMY NEWS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House the following information, and he supposes the rule in relation to applause will have to be suspended:

SPOTTSYLVANIA COURT-HOUSE, May 12, 12 m.

We have made a ten-strike to-day. Hancock went in at daylight. He has taken over four thousand prisoners, and over twenty-five guns, and is still fighting. Everybody is fighting, and have been for eight days. We shall have them this pop, though it may take a day or two more. They fight like devils.

Our losses are heavy. Cannot say how many. If Angus's forces were here now we could finish them to-day. Hancock captured General Ned Johnson and two other generals, besides lots of lower grades. The old Republic is firm. Bet your pile on it.

Grant is a giant and hero in war; but all our generals are gallant; and our men—the world never had better.

Yours, in haste,

INGALLS.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, stating, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of May 9, calling for a copy of the report of Captain Reynolds's exploration of the Yellow Stone river in 1860, that the chief engineer reports that the document called for is not complete, and that Captain Reynolds has been directed to complete it as soon as the duties with which he is charged will admit.

COURTS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. KERNAN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (S. The amendment was agreed to; and then the bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KERNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISAAC ALLEN.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill to increase the pension of Isaac Allen, which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in extenso. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to increase the pension of Isaac Allen from one half to a full pension, such increase to commence on the 26th of April, 1864, and to continue during his natural life.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM W. PHELPS, ETC.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported back the petition of William W. Phelps and James M. Kavanaugh, asking pay as members of the Thirty-Fifth Congress from Minnesota during the period from the commencement of said Congress to the admission of that State, and moved that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WILSON. That has been passed on twice by the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not know how many other committees it has gone to. I move that it be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand how the claim went to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose because it was an invalid claim.

The motion to lay upon the table was agreed to.

THOMAS BOOTH.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES KEENAN, DECEASED.

Mr. DAWSON. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back House bill No. 63, to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China, by allowing him $2,801 84, the amount of judgment in certain cases obtained against him, and paid by him; and also to pay him the amount incurred by him in the exchange between the countries, whatever it may be, and charge him with any balance on the books of the Treasury against him, and to pay him the balance, if any appears in his favor, out of any money not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. DAWSON. This bill has received the unanimous approbation of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. Keenan, now deceased, was consul at Hong Kong, China. There are three different items or claims, to wit:

1. Relief afforded by him to shipwrecked, destitute American citizens for the quarter ending December 31, 1856.

2. Moneys expended in defending himself in a suit brought against him in the colonial court of Hong Kong, in the case of Lyne & Tye vs. J. Keenan, Esq., United States consul, in which the defendant was sued in his official capacity by two Chinamen claiming certain salvage goods in lieu of salvage therefor, belonging to the cargo of the American bark Mermaid, wrecked on the Pratas shoals.

3. For expenses attendant upon the defense of his right as United States consul, and in protecting the rights of American citizens in the case of Rex vs. Keenan, for the alleged rescue of Captain E. H. Nichols, of the American bark Reindeer, from custody.

In March, 1856, the American bark Mermaid, bound from Bombay to Whampoa, was wrecked in China waters, and the captain, crew, and a portion of the cargo were saved by a Chinese lorch. The captain of the Mermaid made his protest of the wreck before the United States consul at Hong Kong, and an affidavit that the owners of the lorch were to receive salvage on the goods saved, according to the decision of the United States consular court, and desired the consul to take charge of the goods saved. Acting under "instructions to consuls in relation to wrecks" from the Department, Mr. Keenan took charge of the saved cargo, and sold the same by public sale. The captain of the wrecked vessel had in the mean time left Hong Kong, and the owners of the lorch, Lyne & Tye, claimed the whole proceeds of the sale, instead of salvage, and this being refused by the consul, brought suit against him and obtained judgment for the whole amount, with costs.

There is in reality no claim at all. The Department state that they desire to settle his accounts; that there is no question as to the justice in the case; that they would settle it at once if they had the authority.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUNISHMENT OF COUNTERFEITING, ETC.

Mr. KASSON. I am instructed by the Committee on a Uniform System of Coinage, Weights, and Measures to report a bill to prevent and punish the counterfeiting of the coin of the United States. I am aware that it is not a private bill, but it is considered one important to be passed, and I ask the consent of the House to report it now and put it on its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was reported and read a first and second time.

The bill provides a penalty of a fine not exceeding $3,000, and imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both, in the discretion of the court, for counterfeiting any of the gold or silver or other coins of the country, or for uttering or passing any token or original device resembling the coins of the United States or of any foreign Government.

ARMY NEWS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has a dispatch from the Army. If there be no objection, the business before the House will be suspended to enable him to present it to the House.

There was no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the permission of the House, I will state briefly the substance of a dispatch received from Mr. Dana, Assistant Secretary of War, from the battle-field, dated at General Grant's headquarters yesterday morning at eight o'clock. He states that during the night previous Hancock took up a new position between Wright and Burnside; that at daylight he attacked him with his usual impetuosity, forcing the first and second lines of the enemy, taking the whole of Major General Johnson's and a part of Early's divisions prisoners, capturing the rebel Major General Johnson, Brigadier General Johnson and General George Steuart, together with forty guns; that Burnside opened at the same time, and advanced with little opposition, forming a junction with Hancock; that Wright attacked at 7.15 a. m. and was now at work. Warren is demonstrating in front to hold the enemy, who was strong in front; that the precise number of prisoners taken is not known, but that they may be counted by thousands. [Applause.]

PUNISHMENT OF COUNTERFEITING—AGAIN.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the following letter may be read from the Treasury Department.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 2, 1864.

SIR: It has been the practice during the last few years for parties in the gold-producing regions of our country to issue coins of gold largely alloyed with the silver naturally present. The devices on these pieces, in most instances, are in close imitation of those on the legal coin, and they pass current to a considerable extent in the far West, although much below the professed value.

In the Atlantic cities a large amount of cent tokens have been issued by private parties and are now in circulation.

This issue by private parties of coins bearing a close resemblance to the coins of the United States, is a reprehensible practice, and is injurious to the public interests. It therefore seems proper that some provision should be made by law to prohibit it. To this end I submit the accompanying draft of a bill for the consideration of your committee and such action as they may think proper.

I am, very respectfully,
S. P. CHASE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JOHN A. KASSON, Chairman Committee on Coinage,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BROOKS. Is this a regular report from a committee?

Mr. KASSON. It is.

Mr. BROOKS. In the first place I desire to call the attention of the members from California and Oregon to this bill, for it concerns them more than it does my section of the country. If it is satisfactory to them I will not object to it; but it strikes me that $3,000 fine and five years' imprisonment is a pretty severe penalty for the circulation of gold tokens, which at one time, if not now in California and on the Pacific coast, were used for business purposes.

Mr. SHANNON. I say to the gentleman from New York that that time has passed.

Mr. BROOKS. If the bill is satisfactory to the gentleman from the Pacific coast I will not object to it.

Mr. SHANNON. I think this is a very proper bill, and I hope the House will pass it. We have a mint at San Francisco, the capacities of which, it is true, are not sufficient for the wants of our commerce; but with the additional machinery which I have no doubt Congress will give us an appropriation to purchase, it will be quite sufficient, so far as California is concerned. It is also asked that a mint be established in Oregon and another in Nevada. If that be done, the facilities for furnishing all the United States coin required for commercial purposes on the Pacific coast will be ample.

It is true that in the earlier history of that country it became necessary for private parties to engage in stamping coin for circulation; but that day has passed. There may be still some little difficulty in Nevada. I think Congress should establish a mint there; but if not, they will have to supply themselves from California. I think the bill is a proper one.

Mr. ELIOT. I wish to ask whether, if this bill be passed in its present shape, it will not prevent the coinage of money altogether? This provides a punishment for coinage without discriminating by whose authority it is done.

Mr. KASSON. It was not of course the intention of the bill, nor do I think it is its effect. Government does its own coinage still, while this bill prevents fictitious coinage. I have no objection, however, to an amendment which shall make it clearer.

Mr. ELIOT. I am afraid it is just that thing. The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move an amendment?

Mr. ELIOT. I would rather that the gentleman who reported the bill should suggest an amendment. I will, however, move to insert after the word "persons," in the first line, the words "except as authorized by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. PRICE. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for tellers on the adoption of the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PRICE and Mr. PRYNN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 65, nays 34.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KNAPP moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—KENTUCKY.

Mr. SMITHERS, from the Committee of Elections, to which was referred the memorial of John H. McHenry, jr., contesting the seat of Hon. George H. Yeaman as Representative from the second congressional district of Kentucky, made a report thereon, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That George H. Yeaman is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the second congressional district of the State of Kentucky in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

The report was laid on the table and ordered to be printed, with leave to the minority to make a report and have it printed at the same time.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Delaware has omitted, in making the report, the usual corresponding decision that the contestant is not entitled to a seat. It should be added to the report.

Mr. SMITHERS. We did not report such a resolution, under the decision made a day or two since by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The opinion of the Chair is that a second resolution is not necessary, although it is usual to have it reported. If the first resolution is carried, the claim of the contestant falls.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a personal explanation, which will consume but a moment. I wish to say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FENTON] has just handed me a dispatch from Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, saying he understood that he was paired, on the Raritan railroad bill, with myself. Having seen that I voted, he is evidently surprised that I should have voted. The understanding was, when he asked me to pair with him, that Mr. FENTON had arranged a pair, and, if that pair failed, he requested me to pair with him. Mr. FENTON, however, did not inform me that the pair had failed, and therefore I considered myself not paired.

Mr. ASHLEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. L. MYERS] distinctly stated yesterday that one of his colleagues was paired with Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey.

Mr. FENTON. When Mr. STEELE had some conversation with me in reference to his pair, I said I would pair him with Mr. MARVIN, who left for New York for ten days or so. He said that would be very satisfactory, unless Mr. MARVIN would vote on the same side with him on the Raritan railroad bill. I told him I could not say how that was, but that I would address my colleague, who was in New York. I did so, and last night I received a reply at nine o'clock by mail, saying that Mr. STEELE, if here, could vote as he pleased, that he had no very great interest in regard to the question. Of course it was too late then to seek a pair for Mr. STEELE with any other gentleman.

Mr. ASHLEY. It was distinctly announced in the Hall that Mr. STEELE was paired off with a gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARFIELD. If I am considered as paired, I will withdraw my vote.

MERCANTILE MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company of New York; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and pay to the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company of New York eight United States notes, not bearing interest, of $1,000 each, in lieu of eight United States notes issued under the act of Congress of February 25, 1862, which were lost and destroyed by the foundering of the steamer Quincy on the 10th of December, 1863, upon their executing to the United States a proper bond of indemnity.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to state to the House that these notes were put into the mail of the United States and delivered on board the steamer Quincy, that that steamer went down off Cape Hatteras, nine persons only saving their lives, and that the ship, mails, cargo, baggage, and everything were lost.

I desire to say further to the House that the proof is ample, beyond all sort of question, from the person who put these notes into the letters and put the letters into the mails, and delivered them on board the steamer. The proof of the shipwreck and loss is from five of the nine persons who were saved from the vessel, the other four not being easily come at.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether these notes were the property of the insurance company or whether they merely insured them?

Mr. PENDLETON. The notes were the property of a gentleman named Brower. They were insured, the insurance company paid the loss, and took an assignment from the owner of all his interest in the notes to the insurance company.

Mr. THAYER. If I understand correctly the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, I do not see upon what principle the Government can be asked to make good the loss suffered under these circumstances by this insurance company. It was a peril which they had insured, as I understand, and upon what principle can they insure against a peril and receive a premium for that insurance, and then, when the loss has been suffered, call upon the Government to indemnify them for that loss? I think that if these notes were in private hands, if they had been the private property of the insurance company at the time of the loss, it would, of course, have been perfectly proper that new notes should be issued in place of those which are thus proven to have been lost. But cases of this kind are constantly arising, and it is important now that the House should understand the principle upon which they are to be called upon to act in reference to these insurance companies. It seems to me that where an insurance company has taken a risk of this kind, and received money by way of premium for assuming that risk, they have no right to complain when the loss is suffered and no right to call upon the Government to indemnify them for that loss. I do not understand that the United States Government are to replace these notes whenever an insurance company suffers a loss. It seems to me that in that case the insurance companies would do a very profitable business. They will receive a premium without incurring the slightest degree of risk. They will insure and receive pay for insuring where no risk is assumed. I cannot understand how it is that, having been paid for assuming every risk of a loss, for which they have been made good, they can call upon the United States Government to indemnify them for that loss.

This is not, if I understand the gentleman from Ohio, an ordinary case of the loss of notes, the private property of individuals, but it is, in fact, notwithstanding the assignment of the claim to the insurance company, which was of course a mere formality, the case of an insurance company who have assumed a certain risk and been paid for assuming that risk, calling upon the Government to indemnify them for the loss which they have sustained and for the risk which they have run, and for which they have been paid.

Why, sir, upon what principle can these insurance companies take the money which they receive from persons under these circumstances if it is to be understood that the Government is to make good the losses every time notes insured by the company go to the bottom of the sea, or are destroyed by fire, or lost in any other way?

I cannot understand upon what principle the Government should be asked to reissue these notes to parties who make a business of insuring against that very thing which has happened and of receiving money for assuming that very risk.

Mr. PENDLETON. It seems to me that the right of this company to ask this relief can readily be placed on either of two well-settled principles. The case stands entirely upon principles analogous to the case of an abandonment. It stands also upon another principle, that when a party has a just and valid claim he may assign his claim, and the assignee acquires in equity at least all the assignor's rights. The fact that the insurance company takes the risk of loss, undertakes to indemnify the owner against loss, is no reason why, as against all other persons, it may not be subrogated to whatever rights the owner had. It makes no difference to the Government, if it is obliged to replace these lost notes, whether it replaces them to the party who originally had them, or to the insurance company which has succeeded to the interest of that party. It is a question, it seems to me, so plain that it can scarcely be made plainer by argument. It is a question which I think, under the law organizing the Court of Claims, that court could take cognizance of. Certainly if a private individual would be liable to an assignee for the amount of a destroyed note, the Government ought to be. It seems to me that, on the plainest principles of justice and equity, this company should be indemnified even as the original holder of the note should be indemnified; and that to the Government it makes no difference whether it pay the original owner or whether it pay the insurance company, which, having insured these notes, has already paid the owner. I move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to understand something about this matter. Mr. Speaker, it is a most extraordinary proposition to ask, in the present condition of the country, the reimbursement of these insurance companies for greenbacks that they have insured and that may have been lost. The gentleman from Massachusetts here, [Mr. HOOPER,] tells me that he has paid $20,000 for the insurance of greenbacks sent over the country during the war. Does the gentleman from Ohio propose that these insurance companies shall keep the premium and recover the greenbacks that are destroyed? Is the gentleman from Ohio willing to open that wide door? I hope the House will at once put a stop to any such kind of legislation. We have got enough to do to put down the rebellion. And I tell the gentleman from Ohio that we will put it down. We can already hear the thunder of our cannon from Spotsylvania Court-House, although the gentleman and his friends may not cheer when we have the news. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does the gentleman persist in that motion?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do.

Mr. PENDLETON. Cutting off debate after a demagogical speech, which was unworthy of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Ohio wish to debate it?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] was allowed to speak, and has offered to this House a gross, base insult.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is not in order. The Chair will hear no debate on either side of the House unless the motion to lay on the table be withdrawn.

Mr. COX. Then I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio rise to a point of order?

Mr. COX. I rise to make an appeal.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order except by unanimous consent; and objection has been made.

Mr. COX. I wish to reply to the insult.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order, and he will take his seat.

The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table, and it was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 46, noes 57.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, after I had yielded in all courtesy to the gentleman from Illinois in withdrawing the previous question, I did not expect that sort of a speech or this motion from him. If he is content with it, I do not know that I ought to have any reason to be dissatisfied. If he thinks it consistent with his position and ability, I ought not to complain. I am sure he has quite as high an appreciation of himself as I can possibly have of him. What, sir, has a fling of that kind at this side of the House to do with this question? What has the suppression of the rebellion to do with the question whether the Government will do justice to one of its citizens? What have the thunders of battle at Spotsylvania to do with the question whether or not this Government shall replace eight promissory notes which have been proved to have been destroyed when being carried in the mails of the United States? And what has it to do with the question whether, when the gentleman pompously gets up in the House and reads dispatches himself, we cheer or not? Doubtless he would like to be the cynosure of all eyes, to occupy all ears, and when he rises to read his speeches or dispatches, to receive the undivided attention of the House. It would minister to his insatiable egotism. When he deserves that honor perhaps he will have it. Until then he probably will not.

Now, sir, having no disposition here at all events to depart from the custom which I have always pursued, not to enter into a personal controversy with gentlemen on the floor, I leave that and come directly to the question presented by the bill which I have in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means offered to the House. What is that proposition? It is this: a party holding eight promissory notes issued by the Government of the United States desiring to transmit them from New York to New Orleans goes to an insurance company and has them insured. The testimony is unquestioned and unquestionable that they were put into two letters, delivered by the person who put them in the letters into the post office at New York, and delivered by the postmaster or agent of the postmaster on a United States vessel; that that vessel had the mails on board when she foundered off Cape Hatteras. The vessel was lost, the cargo was lost, the mails were lost, and the lives of everybody on board were lost except nine persons. The insurance company, according to its contract, indemnified the party for the loss he sustained, and took from him an assignment of the notes which were lost. That insurance company now comes to the Government of the United States and asks us that these lost promissory notes shall be replaced. Why should it not be done? If it were a case between the insurance company and an individual who issued the notes originally there is not a court of justice in Christendom that would not give judgment. It is a case on which there would be no hesitation, and no respectable lawyer would give an opinion adverse to the claim.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask whether the Court of Claims has jurisdiction of such a case as this? I put the question for this reason: it seems to me this House is hardly the proper place to try the question as to the amount of money which has been lost, and to establish a claim against the Government of the United States. There is no opportunity for cross-examination; no opportunity for the introduction of witnesses on the other side. If the Court of Claims has jurisdiction, on which I am not informed, this is one of those cases which ought to be referred to that tribunal.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am not prepared to say that the Court of Claims has not jurisdiction. If there were the least doubt, if I thought there could be entertained the least doubt on the evidence in the case, I would not ask the House to determine it, for no person has a worse opinion as to the capacity of the House as a tribunal to try disputed facts. They are as clear as clear can be. The testimony admits of no doubt.

Mr. SLOAN. Has that testimony been reported to the House and printed?

Mr. PENDLETON. It has not. The evidence is all here before me, and it is embraced in the affidavits of all the parties. The facts upon which this bill is based met with no question in the Committee of Ways and Means. They were perfectly satisfied of the facts stated.

Mr. SLOAN. Another question. Were the witnesses before the committee?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir, they were not. The testimony of the witnesses is contained in their written affidavits, which were furnished to the committee.

Mr. SLOAN. Which are ex parte affidavits?

Mr. PENDLETON. Of course they are ex parte.

Mr. JENCKES. If I understand the gentleman from Ohio, this bill is in violation of one of the settled principles of commercial insurance law. If I heard correctly the bill read, it proposes that the Government shall replace to the insurance company certain new notes of the United States in the place of some which have been destroyed while on their transit through the mails in a Government vessel. Now, I ask the gentleman if he knows of any precedent in the commercial or insurance law of this country where it has been held that an insurer, who has received a premium for the risk taken, has been subrogated to the right of the insured? The point of all the decisions is this, that the insurer takes his risk absolutely and takes his premium for his risk, without hope of reimbursement from any quarter. When a loss accrues, he is bound to pay it, and he has no right to call upon any party interested in the property, or to use the name of any party interested in it, unless it is stated in the contract of insurance that the insurer shall be subrogated to all the rights of the insured. The risk is separate and independent, and when a loss occurs, the insurer must bear it.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is common in policies of insurance to have a provision that insurance companies shall be subrogated to all the rights of the insured. But I understand that even in the absence of a clause of that kind in a policy, upon an abandonment the insurance company is subrogated to all the rights of the owners of the property.

Mr. GANSON. I understand that there is a doubt upon that point. In Massachusetts the courts held that there is no subrogation whatsoever. In Vermont there was a dictum that the right of subrogation did exist, but I think the courts of that State have not held to that. They now treat the matter upon the ground that the insurance is a separate and distinct bargain, based upon an adequate consideration for the risk assumed, and that therefore the relations which are necessary to subrogate one party in the place of another do not exist in such a case.

Mr. PENDLETON. Even if the insurer is not subrogated to the right of a party insured, there is no principle in the insurance law by which a party who holds a claim may not assign it to the insurance company for its indemnity. And that is the case presented here, in which, after the insurance company has indemnified the party for all the loss by paying up the $8,000, it took an assignment of all the claim which the party had upon the Government. It is not important in this case to settle the law of subrogation. Questions may arise between the insurers and the insured. They do not arise here. There are no such questions between the insurer and the debtor of the assured.

Now, sir, I want to know upon what principle it is contended that by the loss of these notes the debt is extinguished. I want to know who is prepared to say that the Government of the United States can honestly refuse to pay these $8,000 to its citizens because the notes have been destroyed? Somebody has lost them.

Mr. THAYER. *If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I will answer his question. The question is not whether the Government of the United States shall make good to the bona fide holder the lost evidences of its indebtedness. The question is whether the Government of the United States is bound to interfere in behalf of a party situated like this insurance company. The only question, in my judgment, is whether this particular party has a right to come upon the Government for its interference in a matter in which this company has assumed the whole risk, and for assuming which it has been paid.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he would consider it a good claim if it were prosecuted in the name of the original holders of the notes.

Mr. THAYER. Unquestionably I should; and I will add that I have no doubt whatever that the facts, if they were divested of the feature of insurance, would call upon us immediately to pass this bill in order to have these notes reissued, and I have no doubt that the evidence on file sustains the facts; for I have confidence enough in the gentleman from Ohio to believe, without having read the evidence, that he would not report the bill unless the evidence was entirely satisfactory in that respect. But the point is that the parties who ask for this remedy from the Government are not entitled to the remedy. These parties have insured against a peril, and have received the price of insuring that peril. I believe no one doubts that in all ordinary cases it is the bounden duty of the Government to make good all losses of this kind to the owners and bona fide holders of its paper; but when an insurance company, who have made it their duty to insure against the very loss for which they now ask indemnity, come here, and come with an assignment of the claim from the original holders, the position of such persons or company is by no means the same as that of ordinary holders of Government paper. It is, on the contrary, the position of parties who ask the interference of the Government to make good a loss against which they have insured, and for incurring the risk of which they have been paid.

Now, the simple point that I made when I rose was that a party so situated, who made a business of trading in these very perils, had no right to call upon the Government for its interference in its behalf. That is the simple point I make in regard to the case.

Mr. STEVENS. There seems to be a confusion of ideas in regard to this matter. The Government is not called upon to make good this money because it was on a Government vessel, or because the Government was acting as a common carrier. But the Government stood in this condition: here were notes issued by the Government; if those notes had not been held by third parties there would have been no difficulty about the matter. But here were notes issued by the Government. Those notes are proved by unquestioned evidence to be totally destroyed. Now, if that be the fact, and the Government should be sued, would anybody say that the Government could not be recovered against upon the lost obligation, and that persons having interest in it, whether by assignment or otherwise, could not recover? It is not the case of an insurance company asking to be indemnified. It is a claim to be paid for notes which belonged to them. These notes have incontrovertibly been destroyed, and were due by the Government to somebody. Is the Government to get clear of the obligation to pay them simply because of this misfortune? If an individual has given his bond for $1,000, and the bond be burnt, or be proved to be in some manner destroyed, cannot the holder of that bond, or his assignee, recover upon it as a lost obligation—an obligation which once existed and is now destroyed? What relieves the individual from the obligation? He has never paid or discharged his obligation. What right could he have to interfere and inquire how much money I paid as assignee? It is none of his business. It has long ago been decided that the consideration of the assignment cannot be inquired into in the decision upon an obligation.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this insurance company has not a remedy in the Court of Claims.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose, sir, that all that is wanted here is that the bonds be replaced. When the money becomes due they can sue in the Court of Claims, but not before. These bonds are not due, for some time. Therefore it is that simply the fac similes are asked to be issued by the Government. The Government cannot possibly be ever called upon for the originals, for they are at the bottom of the deep sea, where nearly everybody on board went. If this were a claim against the Government as a common carrier it would be a different thing, but it is not placed on that ground.

Mr. WILSON. I had understood from the gentleman from Ohio that these were notes, not bonds.

Mr. PENDLETON. Legal-tender notes.

Mr. WILSON. Then there can be no such difficulty as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests, for these notes were an existing demand against the Government at the time of the loss. If therefore it be a claim against the Government, it can be brought before the Court of Claims.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know what has become of the gentleman's bill to annihilate that court.

Mr. WILSON. I can tell the gentleman. The gentleman from Pennsylvania insisted that the Court of Claims should stand intact, in order that these claims should not be brought before Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman insisted that the Court of Claims should be annihilated, because it was not so good a tribunal as this.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman was stronger than I. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the Committee of Ways and Means had before it the policy of insurance in this case.

Mr. STEVENS. I am not quite sure that we had.

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not know that I have ever seen the policy.

Mr. WILSON. Can the gentleman inform me whether that policy contained a condition providing that the insurance company should be subrogated to the rights of the insured?

Mr. PENDLETON. I cannot.

Mr. WILSON. Then I can see why this party has not gone to the Court of Claims; for unless there is a condition of that kind in the policy the company could not be subrogated to the rights of the party. It has no legal claim whatever, and for that reason it did not go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether the company could not use the name of the original owner in bringing suit.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. PENDLETON. Why, undoubtedly it could.

Mr. WILSON. The basis on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania puts his claim is that this is an existing legal demand against the Government for the Government to supply notes in place of those lost. He says that the company has got a legal right against the Government. If that be so, there can be no difficulty in having this case determined by the Court of Claims. If it be not so, then we should not pass this bill.

Let the case go to the Court of Claims, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists that that court shall live. I have not yet submitted to this House a bill for the entire abolition of the court, but only to take away its jurisdiction over war claims. If the gentleman thinks he is right on the question of law, let that court determine whether these parties have a legal claim against the Government. Otherwise we will be making the Government an insurer of all the insurance and express companies of the country.

Mr. STEVENS. We did not become insurers. This bill is not based upon the supposition that the claim is against the Government as insurers. You are debtors, you owe money, and if you are honest you will pay it; you will not take advantage of a quibble to prevent the payment of the money you owe to the parties to whom it is due under this legal assignment.

Mr. WILSON. I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania has too much respect for the well-settled decisions of the courts of the country, and too much respect for the profession of the law, to pronounce an objection sustained by the uniform decisions of the courts of the country a mere quibble.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not believe there is any decision which prevents an obligor from being called upon to pay his debts, no matter in whose hands they are. It is a very different thing where a vessel has been sunk and the assignee believes all is lost, when an assignment is made to the insurance company for what may be recovered of the wreck, they paying the entire amount of the insurance. This, sir, is not a question of insurance upon the part of the Government.

Mr. WILSON. I will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania this distinction: in the case that has been mentioned of property abandoned to the insurance company, the company paying the amount of the risk, the property assigned is the specific property insured. Now, in this case, if the notes had been partially destroyed, and the remnant saved had been turned over to the insurance company, that would have been a parallel case, and the notes would have furnished a basis on which the company could have properly come to the Government for relief.

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose all the notes had been destroyed except an inch, could not that have been surrendered to the insurance company, and could they not have required the Government to make good the notes?

Mr. WILSON. I understand the rule of the Treasury Department to be that where a note has been defaced, or a part of it destroyed, they redeem in proportion to the amount of the note remaining; so that in this case these parties could have surrendered to the insurance company as much of the notes as remained, and they would have received in proportion to the amount saved, according to the rule I have stated. But these parties do not profess to surrender the particular property insured; that has been destroyed, and therefore the case is not a parallel one.

Mr. PENDLETON. It seems to me after all which has been said, with due deference to all who think otherwise, that this is a very clear case. The Government of the United States owe the amount of these promissory notes. To whom does it owe them? Either to the original holders of the notes or to the insurance company. The notes are destroyed. Is the Government released from the obligation by the destruction of the notes? It owes the debt to one of two parties. There is no third party claiming it, and these two parties have agreed between themselves to whom the debt is due. It is very clear, therefore, to my mind that the Government under these circumstances owes this debt to the insurance company, and the question is, shall it be paid?

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I understood him in his first remarks to say that these notes were insured under an ordinary marine policy, without any contract giving to the insurers the right of subrogation to the rights of the insured. Now, as the gentleman puts the case, I take the distinct issue with him upon his law that there is no case to be found of commercial insurance in this country which authorizes the insurers to have that right unless there be a stipulation in the policy itself, requiring the insured to assign any claims he may have.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says the Government may be a debtor; a debtor to whom? To the party in whose favor the obligation was given. This Government never had any contract with insurers, and never authorized anybody else to make a contract which would bind them. If they were to go into the Court of Claims for a settlement, their case would be thrown out on the ground that they had no title, on the ground that no contract or assignment has been made which could bind this Government as common carriers to insure this property.

Mr. PENDLETON. The gentleman states his case as if the assured contested here the right of the insurance company. It is not so. The assured agrees that the company is subrogated to his rights. He has perfected the title by an assignment. He has removed all doubt on that point. He has come here with his testimony to assert the rights of the company. And it is these gentlemen who, on behalf of the Government, object to an agreement with which both the parties interested are entirely satisfied. Now, will the gentleman be good enough to tell me whether, in case these obligations had been in part lost but also in part saved, the Government would not have been bound to pay under whatever rule had been established for that portion of the notes saved to the insurance company?

Some one has the right to make claim against the Government unless gentlemen want speedily to repudiate. Some one has a claim on the Government to have these notes paid. Who is it? Either the party who originally held them, or the insurance company to which they were assigned. It is not the party who originally held them, because he has transferred his interest for a valuable consideration to the insurance company. If he should endeavor to prosecute his claim in the Court of Claims, I undertake to say that the assignment would be a good defense on the part of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] frankly said that if the person asking to be indemnified were the original holder, he would have these notes immediately reissued. I am perfectly certain that he would. I do not misunderstand him. I would expect nothing else from the candor and honesty of the gentleman and his disposition that the Government should faithfully perform its highest duty, to be just to all its citizens. If the gentleman admits a fair case is made out on behalf of the assignor and no question is raised as to the legality of the assignment, why should not the Government be held to pay the assignee?

It seems to me that there can be no difference of opinion on the subject. If they were lost notes only, I would not ask payment now. They are destroyed promissory notes.

Mr. JENCKES. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that there has been an assignment of this claim by this party to the insurance company?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir, I understand so.

Mr. JENCKES. What is the evidence?

Mr. PENDLETON. The affidavit of the president of the insurance company and the affidavit of the assignor.

Mr. JENCKES. Was the original assignment before the committee?

Mr. PENDLETON. I have not seen it.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman answer me when that assignment was dated, whether after the payment of the consideration money or not?

Mr. PENDLETON. Whether dated before or after, if at the time the payment was made there was a contract, that is sufficient.

Mr. JENCKES. That is not proved.

Mr. PENDLETON. The date would not be material at all.

Mr. JENCKES. There is no such condition in the policy, and no assignment.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am wrong. The assignment is here, or rather a copy of it. No; it appears to be the original.

Mr. JENCKES. What is the date?

Mr. PENDLETON. December 8, 1863.

Mr. JENCKES. That was after the loss and the payment by the insurance company.

Mr. PENDLETON. After the loss, as a matter of course.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman state what is the consideration for the transfer when the risk has become a loss and the insurance company has become charged with the payment of the loss?

Mr. PENDLETON. The assignment is in consideration of $8,000 paid in hand by this insurance company to this party, and by virtue of that there is an assignment transferring to the insurance company all right, title, and interest to the property.

Mr. WILSON. Is not $8,000 the amount of the notes lost? Is not that the amount that was insured?

Mr. PENDLETON. It is the amount paid by the insurance company. That is the contract which the insurance company made.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Ohio what consideration the insurance company paid for the assignment? Did they pay anything more than they were required to pay under the original terms of the policy of insurance?

Mr. PENDLETON. What difference does it make?

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman whether that be the case or not.

Mr. PENDLETON. I say that they paid $8,000, for that was the value of the articles destroyed. And as I read these papers, at the time of paying the amount they took a transfer, assignment, or whatever you choose to call it, of all the right and interest of this party in these destroyed notes.

Mr. WILSON. What was the consideration for that assignment?

Mr. PENDLETON. The payment of $8,000 according to their original contract of insurance.

Mr. WILSON. Was it a new consideration?

Mr. PENDLETON. It was a consideration, whether it was a new one or an old one. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether upon the point which he is seeking now to make, and which I understand perfectly well is a purely technical one, he is prepared to say that the Government of the United States should refuse to pay an admitted just debt. But, sir, on this point of the consideration, I beg to remind the gentleman from Iowa that this is an executed assignment. It need have no consideration; if it were an absolute gift, without a penny passed between the parties, and between third persons, it would be valid. If it were an executory contract, the case might be different.

Mr. WILSON. Place the Government precisely in the position of an individual.

Mr. PENDLETON. The gentleman cannot have the least doubt but that a recovery might be had of an individual under such circumstances, and that the name of one party could be used by the other.

Mr. WILSON. I have so much doubt about it that I say it cannot be used unless provided for in the policy itself.

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose an individual owed to another a bond of $1,000, which he was to send to him by mail; that the person to whom it was due got it insured, but on the way it was burned and destroyed. Does the individual who owes that money get rid of the debt, because the money was burned, and because it was insured in addition?

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman knows very well that the two cases stand upon entirely different principles.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not care a cent, so far as this question is concerned, whether the question of subrogation applies or not. It appears that the Government issued these notes, and the Government is bound to make them good in the hands of somebody. If lost, it seems to me they must be made good to the parties who lost them. It is the principle of justice and equity as applied to the matter which shall govern my opinion. If the insurance company insured the notes and they were lost, and the company made good the value to the owners, I see nothing but justice in the fact that the Government should pay the value of those notes to the insurance company. I do not care whether the doctrine of subrogation applies or not.

If we were a court here acting under commercial law, so ably alluded to and expounded by the gentleman from Rhode Island, all these arguments and all this learning might be of some importance. But we are the law-making power, as I understand it. We are to do justice, and if there is a defect in the law whereby injustice would be worked to a party seeking justice at our hands we should make a law which will do justice. The act we pass does not stand upon the Journal as the judgment of a court. It stands as an act of legislation. We are proceeding as the law-making power, and not as a judicial body, and therefore I think that all this technical discussion about this existing doctrine of subrogation, &c., which I do not understand, is entirely out of place. If there be no law for paying these parties I am for making a special law in this case, under which the Government shall pay these notes. That, I think, will subserve the cause of justice, and therefore I shall vote for the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. Nicolay, his Private Secretary, informed the House that the President had approved and signed an act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State.

MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY—AGAIN.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask whether this be a question of right or a question of favor. If it be granted as a matter of favor, as the gentleman from Kentucky seems to consider it, it will be a precedent in favor of other cases, and we must apply it as a precedent in cases which come before the House. But I have to say this, and only this, that if this bill is passed the business of insuring greenbacks will be the most profitable insurance business in the country. All that the insurers will have to do will be, in the first place to pocket the premium, and then, if loss occurs, to come to this Government and be reimbursed.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that if his view be correct the premium charged on insurance of greenbacks will be reduced so low as to increase the value of greenbacks in the market, the thing which we all so much desire.

Mr. GARFIELD. If my colleague will allow me, I wish to say that this seems to me to be a perfectly clear case. Our Government does redeem its mutilated notes now; and in cases where the mutilation is so great that only small fragments of the notes remain it redeems the proportional value that the fragments bear to the whole note. I think we ought to pass some law to provide for the redemption of notes which have no fragments left but which are clearly proved to have been utterly destroyed.

A case came into my hands a few weeks since in which a party sent me the fragments of some notes which had been burned. They were sent to the Treasury Department; and, according to the rules of that Department, one half of the amount of the notes was allowed. But I was informed at the same time that they had no rules for paying notes that had been utterly destroyed, even though the proof of their destruction were perfect; and that such cases must be referred to the future legislation of Congress.

Mr. FENTON. I will inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if the fragments thus presented to the Treasury Department must not mark the identity of the notes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. COLE, of California. I would ask the gentleman if under the rule which has been established the party would not be entitled to come to Congress for loss sustained by one half of the notes being gone.

Mr. GARFIELD. I presume he would. But all I mean to say is this, that the Treasury Department in exercising what seems to me to be a very just power does recognize the right of holders to be remunerated for losses of this sort. The only objection I have to the bill now before us is that it is a special bill and in favor of a special party. It seems to me that we ought to have a general law covering all these cases, and if the passage of this bill will not prejudice the passage of such a general law, if I can have any pledge from the Committee of Ways and Means that it will provide a general rule covering all such cases, I shall have no objection whatever to the passage of this bill. I do object, however, to special legislation for corporations, when individuals all over the country are suffering because they have not influence enough to come before Congress and get through measures for their own relief.

Mr. THAYER. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that gentlemen who favor this bill seem to misconceive very much the point involved. This is not the case of notes lost in the hands of an ordinary holder, but it is the case of an application for extraordinary relief on the part of a company that has insured against this very peril, for which it now asks relief from Congress. Now, what I say is that the company has no equity in demanding this extraordinary relief from the Government. The question, therefore, which has been argued, whether the Government does not owe the amount of these notes to somebody, is entirely aside from the question now before us. The Government may or may not owe this to somebody. We all know that thousands and thousands of debts of this kind are extinguished every day by banking institutions in the country by the loss of the notes which are the evidence of their indebtedness. I suppose that in an ordinary case a man who comes here to ask relief of this kind would be entitled to it immediately, but the point here is that the parties who ask for this extraordinary relief from Congress have no equity entitling them to ask it, because they are asking to be made good for a loss against which they have insured, and for insuring which they have been paid.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to ask my colleague a question. What right has a defendant who owes the money to inquire into the equity of the title of the plaintiff? In the case of Armstrong against Lancaster it was decided that he had no such right.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, reference has been made to the character of the gentlemen who make this application. In the first place, the party who owned the notes originally and had them insured would make no claim unless it was a well-grounded one. The statement of the firm is all that a New York merchant would require. The president, secretary, and trustees of this insurance company are among the best men of the city of New York. Their statement of a loss is all that any gentleman who knows them would require. They have made their affidavits. Their affidavits cover the whole ground. I deem it due to them to say that there is no earthly doubt about the justice of this claim.

It is proposed as an additional security that the company shall give a bond of indemnity for twice the amount involved, so that if the notes should turn up the company—one of the most responsible in the country—will be liable to the Government for the amount.

In reference to the merits of the case it seems to me that gentlemen should act upon it as they would do between each other in a matter of business. The Government certainly owes somebody $8,000. We have abundance of proof that this $8,000 has been entirely lost. Why, then, should not this insurance company be indemnified by the Government for the loss it has incurred? There are precedents for this course. I find in the statutes of 1846 that agents of the Government who had Treasury notes purloined from their possession which were stolen and passed into circulation have been indemnified to the extent of $50,000. I see no reason why these notes that are known to have been lost and destroyed should not be reissued to the parties entitled to them. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. PENDLETON moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 67; nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bailly, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Davison, Eden, Elderton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Lazarus, Long, Malory, Marey, McAllister, McBride, Middleton, William H. Miller, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Prunty, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denning, Briggs, Eliot, Fenton, Grinnell, Higby, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Huggins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Keaton, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Loun, Longyear, McClurg, McDaniel, F. Miller, Moorhead, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Portland, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, and Wilson—65.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. PENDLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The morning-hour business continues all day, unless interrupted, after the expiration of the hour, by other business, such as a special order, going into Committee of the Whole, or proceeding to business on the Speaker's table. Reports of committees are therefore still in order, and the next committee to be called is the Committee of Claims.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask my colleague to give way to me to report, from the Committee of Ways and Means, a bill to pay the expenses of investigating committees. Members of the committee on the conduct of the war have had to go to Fort Pillow, and are now ordered to go to other places, and have not got a dollar appropriated for their expenses.

Mr. HALE. I yield, if it will take up no time.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, then reported back Senate joint resolution No. 37, for the payment of the expenses incurred by the joint committee on the conduct of the war.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CONTESTANT.

Mr. UPSON. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections to report back the resolution referred to that committee for the payment of Mr. Bruce, contesting the seat of Mr. Loan, with the following as a substitute for the resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to John P. Bruce for the time spent and expenses incurred while contesting the right of Benjamin F. Loan to a seat in this House as Representative, the usual mileage for one session and the monthly compensation during the session, to and including the month of May.

Mr. STEVENS. If I understand it correctly, the original resolution gave to Mr. Bruce the usual pay and mileage, and that the substitute proposes to give him a specific sum. Now, sir, I am opposed to the substitute. I go upon the principle that where a contestant makes out a prima facie case he is entitled to pay and mileage, and that where he makes out no prima facie case, whatever is given him is merely a matter of grace upon the part of the House. Now, suppose a member is occupying a seat here and the contestant claims the election and unseats him. It shows that the member never was entitled to the seat, and yet he always receives pay and mileage from the commencement of Congress until the case is decided. You cannot give him only a portion of the amount, you must give him the entire amount; and so I hold that when the contestant comes here with a prima facie case he is entitled to the whole amount. In this instance the contestant has made out a prima facie case by obtaining the report of the committee in his favor.

Now, it is just like a case before a grand jury. One man prosecutes another. If the bill is found it makes out a prima facie case, and the party is not liable to be proceeded against for malicious prosecution; while if the grand jury ignore the case the presumption is the other way. Now, here is a prima facie case, and it seems to me that the usual rule should be followed. I hope, therefore, that the substitute will not be adopted, and that the original resolution will be adopted.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is somewhat mistaken in relation to the substitute reported by the committee. The substitute mentions no specific sum; but the committee thought it would be just and proper to allow the contestant mileage for one session, and also the regular pay of a member from the time the session commenced, which will be some six months, and make the amount somewhere near three thousand dollars in all.

The House will remember that the committee did not report in favor of the contestant, but reported against both the contestant and the sitting member.

In relation to the practice which has heretofore prevailed, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is much more familiar with it than I am; but I am informed that while the rate of compensation for members was eight dollars a day the rule usually adopted in these cases was to allow a per diem from the commencement of the session, and not to allow it from the commencement of the Congress on the 4th of March. The committee thought the rule adopted prior to the time a salary was paid a very good one to follow, and that under the circumstances the amount which this resolution would involve would perhaps be a sufficient compensation. They do not desire to encourage contests upon frivolous grounds for the purpose of enabling the contestant to make a profitable speculation out of it. The majority of the committee, as I remarked, decided that neither of these parties was entitled to occupy a seat in this House. They declared the election to be void, but under the rule the contestant had sufficiently a prima facie case to entitle him to some compensation, and the committee therefore determined to report the substitute.

Mr. GANSON. I will suggest to the gentleman, the reason why the principle was adopted was that if it had been otherwise the contestant would get more than a member of Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose that Mr. Loan had been unseated, according to the report of the Committee of Elections, would he have been paid or not? Now, would he not have been paid?

Mr. BAXTER. He would, because he held the certificate of election.

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose that the House had decided that he was not elected, would he not have drawn pay from the time of the election?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. In former times, in a case like the one under consideration, Congress would have voted him eight dollars a day from the commencement of the session until the time he retired from the House. They could do nothing more; because if they did they would vote him more than the sitting member would have.

Under the circumstances of this case, it is clear to me that Mr. Bruce made a prima facie case. It is true that the Committee of Elections, on investigation, decided that the election was void, and that neither of the parties from the seventh congressional district of Missouri was entitled to a seat upon this floor. The majority of the House decided that Mr. Loan was entitled to a seat. It reversed the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. A. MYERS. I understand the gentleman from Vermont to say that Mr. Bruce made out a prima facie case. What does he mean?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. He was here under that apparent right which enabled him to come as a bona fide contestant from the district which he claimed to represent.

Mr. A. MYERS. Did the committee decide that he made out a prima facie case?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The committee decided that neither of the gentlemen made out a case; whether that neither made out a prima facie case, I do not know. The report of the committee was that neither was entitled to a seat.

Now, the case comes within the rule when eight dollars per diem was allowed to members of Congress. If eight dollars per diem were now the pay of a member of Congress, he would be entitled to that pay from the commencement of the session to the time that the case was decided. I think that he came here in good faith; coming here with a prima facie case, the committee having decided that neither was entitled to a seat, and then the House having decided that one of them, General Loan, was entitled to a seat, I think that Mr. Bruce is entitled to his pay and traveling expenses up to the time that he was retired as much as any member of Congress.

I believe in doing justice. I do not believe in saving a few dollars to the Government at the expense of the principle of justice. If there ever was a contestant entitled to pay, in my judgment, from what I have learned from the report of the committee and the arguments made in this case, it is Mr. Bruce. If he is entitled to anything he is entitled to the amount he would have received if he had been decided to be a member of the House. I would not vote for this if he came without an apparent right. In the case of Mr. Sleeper it was decided that he should receive nothing; and I suppose that decision was made on the ground that there was not sufficient reason for him to present his application. But it is clear to my mind that Mr. Bruce had sufficient ground. It took a long time for the committee to decide the matter. They did not decide that the sitting member or the contestant was entitled to a seat. The House having revised that decision decided that General Loan was entitled to the seat. I voted with the majority. But while I deemed it proper under all of the circumstances to vote for General Loan, I deem it just and proper that Mr. Bruce should be paid.

Mr. SPALDING. I am entirely in favor of the amendment proposed by the Committee of Elections, if I understand correctly what it is. It proposes to pay to the contestant from the commencement of the session a monthly compensation such as any of us receive by the month, and it proposes further to pay him mileage from his place of residence to this city, the same as members receive. Now, I put it to members to know, and I ask them to answer me and tell me, whether this man now asks compensation as a member of Congress, or compensation as a contestant. If they say as a member of Congress, I reply that he has never been a member of this Congress, and therefore is not entitled to compensation as a member of Congress. If he claims as contestant—and nobody doubts his right to claim in that respect—he receives pay for his time and services in contesting the right to his seat, and that right arises from the first day of the session until the right was determined by the action of this House.

And in addition to that he has a large mileage which must amply pay him for any incidental expenses. I say we have not money enough to allow us to be anything more than just, and if we are just it is all we can be expected to do at this time. I do not think there will be a dissenting voice in this House in regard to paying the monthly compensation and the traveling fees from his place of residence to this city. But I think we have a right to object, and that our constituents would have a right to object, to our paying the contestant at the rate of the salary of a member of Congress—paying it to a man who has not been in the service of the country, and never had the prima facie evidence of a member of Congress, for when he came here and submitted his claim the committee reported that neither person was entitled to the seat, though the House determined to give the seat to the sitting member. All, therefore, that the contestant can ask is a monthly compensation and traveling fees.

Mr. GANSON. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if he would not allow pay for sixty days engaged in taking testimony, in addition to the time that Congress has been in session.

Mr. SPALDING. We allow compensation for that in this very ample mileage. The mileage will compensate the gentleman for more than sixty days' labor.

Mr. HALE. I think this question is well understood, and therefore I demand the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania because he supposed the gentleman from Michigan had yielded the floor; but if the gentleman says he still holds it, the Chair will decide that he is entitled to it.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will move the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. I intend to do so very soon. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the pay of a member is fixed by law as a matter of right, but the pay of a contestant is to be fixed by this House; and therefore they regulate it as they deem just and proper in the case presented. We adapt the pay in each case to the circumstances, doing what we consider substantial justice. In the case of a contested election from Louisiana a nominal sum was fixed for the contestant; and in the case from Massachusetts, this present session, the committee reported a certain amount, but the House refused to vote anything.

In this case the committee have not fixed a specific amount, but have adopted a rule which will determine the amount of mileage and six months' compensation, commencing with the present session, and including the whole of the present month. That we think right and equitable under all the circumstances of the case. We have numerous other cases like this, and the rule determined upon in this will be a precedent for the cases which will follow, and hence the importance of adopting a rule in this case which shall be just and equitable. The compensation and mileage recommended by the committee will amount to $2,636, and, under all the circumstances, the committee consider this a fair and just compensation.

Mr. DAWES. As has been stated by my colleague on the committee who reported this resolution, the committee have had no rule until this session with reference to compensation to contestants since the change of the compensation law of members of Congress, and there have been all sorts of rules adopted by the House. The House at one time voted $3,000 to a contestant when he had been here only a few weeks. Again they voted at another time $18,000 in one resolution to be divided among a number of contestants who had been here contesting seats different lengths of time.

But it seemed to the committee highly important that a rule should be adopted, and the committee adopted this rule in the Massachusetts case, in establishing a fixed sum, although it reported the resolution in a different form. It was, however, an amount arrived at by the same rule, excepting that there was no mileage included in the resolution in that case, but simply a monthly compensation from the 1st of December.

In that instance the House declined to pay anything, because it thought the contestant had not a prima facie case or any reasonable ground of contest.

The committee in this case came to the conclusion that it should adopt the rule which obtained universally here before the compensation act was passed; namely, a monthly compensation to begin when the per diem would have begun under the old system. They know of no better rule than that, leaving the House to judge in each case whether there should be any compensation or not. I believe that in this case everybody admits there should be compensation, and the only question is what shall be the rule. What better rule can there be than the one reported by the committee? I had some doubts whether compensation ought not to be allowed for the sixty days during which the parties had to take depositions; but on the whole I was of opinion, and the committee was of opinion, that this was the best policy to adopt.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections what the rule is which he now announces.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps I ought not to call it a rule; but the committee was of the opinion that in each case where there was reasonable cause to justify compensation at all, it ought to report in favor of paying mileage and a monthly compensation from the commencement of the session to the conclusion of the case. That is precisely the same rule that was always adopted when the compensation of members of Congress was a per diem one.

Mr. SMITHERS. I will only state that the compensation of this contestant will amount, under this resolution, to something over twenty-six hundred dollars. The House will bear in mind that the committee reported that there was no prima facie case on the part of Mr. Bruce. He came here not in the character of a contestant, but as a party who was vindicating a public right, asking that the seat should be vacated. Under no circumstances could he have occupied the seat, and therefore I do not see that we ought to pay him as a member of the House. I think, however, that we should hold him harmless, and give him liberal compensation. I think the sum arrived at by the Committee of Elections is not only sufficient to save him harmless, but to give him something more than his expenses.

Mr. UPSON. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, being first upon the substitute reported by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, demanded tellers. Tellers were not ordered.

The substitute was agreed to—ayes 68, noes 44. The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE COLUMBIA BANK.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the Columbia

Bank; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES E. KILGORE.

Mr. HALE, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the claim of James E. Kilgore, executor of William Kilgore; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE MOWRY.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of George Mowry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN ROACH.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Benjamin Roach; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES L. NELSON.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 197) for the relief of Charles L. Nelson.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles L. Nelson $308 for his services as agent for the improvement of the harbor of Burlington, Vermont, from 15th January, 1863, to 2d April, 1863, inclusive, at four dollars per day.

There being no objection to considering the bill in the House, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES B. CURTIS, JR.

Mr. HALE, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution referring back to the Court of Claims a report made to Congress on 20th January, 1863, in the case of Charles B. Curtis, Jr., with the accompanying papers; which received its several readings, and was passed.

G. H. CLARK.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported back a joint resolution for the relief of G. H. Clark, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Court of Claims.

It was so referred.

SARAH ROBINSON.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Sarah Robinson, widow of Hon. John L. Robinson, late United States marshal for the district of Indiana; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to the account of Hon. John L. Robinson, late United States marshal, the sum of $675, for services rendered by him in making preparations for taking the census of 1860; and directs that in the legal adjudication of such accounts judgment shall be rendered only for the balance found to be due, without any interest or penalties whatever.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the consideration of the bill in the House. It makes an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. It is not an appropriation bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN C. McCONNELL.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John C. McConnell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

HOOPER AND WILLIAMS, AND OTHERS.

Mr. PRUYN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Hooper & Williams, Livingston, Kincaid & Co., Gilbert & Gerrish, and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

GERHARDT AND STEVENS.

Mr. PRUYN. The case of Gerhardt & Stevens was before the committee, but the papers are not here. I ask leave to present them after the reading of the Journal on Tuesday, that they may go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

It was so ordered.

BURNSIDE AND COMPANY.

Mr. HOTCHKISS, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of Burnside & Co., praying compensation for the loss of beef cattle taken by the rebels; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN J. MICHIE.

Mr. HOTCHKISS also, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 338, for the relief of John J. Michie, of New Orleans, Louisiana, with an amendment.

The bill and amendment were read.

The bill makes an appropriation for the payment of John J. Michie for cotton belonging to him on the Yazoo river seized by order of General F. J. Herron in 1863, and sold by order of the Treasury Department.

The amendment changes the original bill so as to provide for releasing and remitting to the claimant the net proceeds of the sale after deducting cost of transportation, &c.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the original bill makes an appropriation, and that it will require unanimous consent to consider it in the House.

Mr. WILSON. I think the bill had better go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I hope the bill will be considered in the House and passed. This cotton was seized on the plantation of the claimant and sold by the Treasury Department. The matter has been thoroughly examined by the Committee of Claims. It is fully established that the claimant is a loyal citizen, and has at all times been such; that he has never taken any part in the rebellion or given aid and comfort to the enemy. He took the oath of allegiance as soon as he had the opportunity after New Orleans was taken. His title to the property is fully established, as well as that it was seized, has been sold, and that the money is now held by the Treasury Department. The case is made out by the clearest evidence, and I see no reason why there should be any delay in having this amount refunded to him.

We do not propose to pay any specific sum out of the Treasury; we do not propose to conclude the Treasury Department by this bill; we merely send him to the Secretary of the Treasury and give the accounting officers power to scrutinize the matter and determine. If upon further examination the Department find any objection to paying the claim it will not be paid. All that the committee recommend in his behalf is that the proceeds of the sale of this property shall be paid to him after paying all necessary expenses, if they find the claim established upon principles of right and justice. I think there is no shadow of doubt resting upon his case, and I hope the House will consent that the bill be passed.

Mr. WILSON. I must raise the question of order that the bill makes an appropriation, and must therefore go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill is therefore in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I wish to suggest that this whole claim has been examined by General Grant, and he has recommended that it be paid. He is satisfied of the loyalty of this man, and made this recommendation in his favor. I believe that whatever has been recommended by General Grant has generally been unanimously adopted in this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from New York that the bill is in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I respectfully suggest to the Chair that the bill is before the House, and I hope it will be passed.

The SPEAKER. The point of order having been raised by the gentleman from Iowa, the Chair decided that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. FENTON. I understood the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from Iowa did not so understand it.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. As amended by the committee it is not an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The original bill made an appropriation. It is true the committee proposed to so amend it as to bring it outside the rule, but that does not affect the question of order which applies to the original bill.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering this bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order, except by general consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar is in order, is it not?

The SPEAKER. It is, but there are other bills which will take precedence of this.

AMBROSE MORRISON.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Ambrose Morrison, of Nashville, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WINDOM asked to put the bill on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill making an appropriation, cannot be considered in the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. D. TURNER, ETC.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of J. D. Turner and W. G. Raymond; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DEBORAH JONES.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHALEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY A. HYDE.

Mr. WHALEY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Mary A. Hyde, which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHALEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARGARET M. STAFFORD.

Mr. WHALEY also, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 139, for the relief of Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, of Coshocton county, Ohio, with the recommendation that it do pass, which was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHALEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WHALEY, from the same committee, made sundry adverse reports; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

VALENTINE WEHRHEIM.

Mr. ROSS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Valentine Wehrheim; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

S. C. AND E. WROE AND OTHERS.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of S. C. & E. Wroe and others; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. The bill makes an appropriation, and requires unanimous consent to be considered in the House.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PETER NAVARRE, OF OHIO.

Mr. ASHLEY, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 393, granting an invalid pension to Peter Navarre, of Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill directs that Peter Navarre, of the State of Ohio, be placed on the roll of invalid pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars per month, during his natural life, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1864.

It appears from the report that Peter Navarre is a grandson of Robert de Navarre, intendant and sub-delegate of Detroit, in the territory which now constitutes the State of Michigan, during the reign of Louis XV; that said Peter Navarre served under General Hull, as a scout, on the northwestern frontier; that he was among the prisoners at Hull's surrender at Detroit, and was sent home on parole; afterwards broke his parole, served General Winchester at River Raisin, gave him early information of the approach of the British army, took part in both actions of Colonel Lewis on the 18th of January, 1812, and the engagement of the next day, resulting in the defeat of the Americans; that at Major Madison's surrender, finding himself, by the violation of his parole, in a position in which his life was forfeited, he escaped from the British and Indians, incurring great hardships for many days in mid-winter, in traveling through the wilderness, returning to his home; that General Harrison, coming into the Northwest with his army, sent for petitioner and engaged him as a scout, until the close of the war, for the sum of one dollar per day. He was frequently sent by General Harrison, while in this service, with messages from one point to another, on one occasion going on foot to Urbana, in southern Ohio, through the wilderness, with a message to Governor Meigs, and again, on the day preceding the battle of Lake Erie, carrying a message from General Harrison, at Fort Seneca, to Commodore Perry, at Put-in-bay; that he was present and aided in the defense of Fort Stephenson, under Colonel Croghan, and accompanied the army on its march in pursuit of Proctor, and took part in the battle of the Thames. He is now poor and old, (being in his seventyninth year,) and, in consequence of disabilities occasioned by long exposure while engaged in the arduous and exposed service, is, and has been for a number of years, unable to procure a livelihood for himself and family.

Mr. ASHLEY. I know this old man well, and all that he has ever received has been a land warrant.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW CENSUS IN 1865.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 53) providing for the taking of a census of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, this joint resolution authorizes the taking of the census in 1865, leaving the officer in charge of the work liberty to avail himself of the labors of such States as shall enumerate their inhabitants in that year. The importance of understanding the numerical and arms-bearing population and the resources of the country is clear to the comprehension of men of intelligence. We cannot, in view of the great questions of legislation that force themselves upon the consideration of the practical minds of the country, over-estimate the value of the information to be derived from the ascertainment of the population and the capacity and resources of the country. A new census will furnish accurate information in regard to the productive and unproductive wealth of the country, the changes which have been wrought in manufactures and the mechanic arts, and the effects of the war upon our population and resources. A census, I am confident, will demonstrate the energetic character of our people, and the facility with which they vary their resources, in adapting themselves readily to circumstances, and give confidence in our ability to pay promptly the interests and principal of our accumulating national debts. If the taking of the census is postponed until 1870 we may be in doubt ourselves touching the reality of our progress, and other nations may consider us as exhausted and enfeebled by this long civil war. By postponing the taking of the census to 1870 we lose the opportunity of ascertaining the real and immediate influence of this state of war on the progress of our numbers and resources, as the rapid changes incident to the return of peace serve to obscure the real effects of the war. It is especially important not only to know the degree of prosperity or adversity attending the people, but to understand how much of either is due to the state of war and what the result of the condition of peace.

The resources of the nation are better ascertained by a census which is not used directly as a basis of taxation than they are by any system of inquiry adapted directly to the attaining of revenue; so is a census of population more valuable as to the number of men of military ages than is any system of enrollment. The experience of other nations demonstrates the truth of this proposition. Many deeply interesting social questions will be solved by a census taken in 1865, after, as we hope, the close of this gigantic war. The determination to take the census then will show to the world that the American people entertain no fears respecting the developments of a census. I move the reference of this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, and commend it to their careful consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

TREATMENT OF PASSENGERS ON THE ISTHMUS.

Mr. NESMITH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

A bill (S. No. 76) relating to appointments in the naval service and courts-martial;

A bill (H. R. No. 185) to establish a postal money order system; and

A bill (H. R. No. 370) to appoint certain officers of the Navy.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 12th instant an act (H. R. No. 159) for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State.

GENERALS SCHENCK AND BLAIR.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to take up the resolution which I offered on Wednesday last.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read before the question is put on taking it up.

The Secretary read the following resolution, which was submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 11th instant:

Whereas the President of the United States, in a communication to the House of Representatives of date 28th of April ultimo, represents, "that prior to and at the meeting of the present Congress, Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, and Frank P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, members-elect thereto, by and with the consent of the Senate held commissions from the Executive as major generals in the volunteer army," and that "General Schenck tendered the resignation of his said commission and took his seat in the House of Representatives at the assembling thereof, upon the distinct verbal understanding with the Secretary of War and the Executive that he might at any time during the session, at his own pleasure, withdraw said resignation and return to the field;" and whereas the President in said communication states further, that "General Blair was, by temporary agreement with General Sherman, in command of a corps through the battles in front of Chattanooga, and in the march to the relief of Knoxville, which occurred in the latter days of December last, and of course was not present at the assembling of Congress;" and "that when he subsequently arrived here he sought and was allowed by the Secretary of War and the Executive the same conditions and promises as allowed and made to General Schenck;" and further, that "General Blair holds no military commission or appointment other than herein stated;" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the arrangement aforesaid, made by the President and the Secretary of War with Generals Schenck and Blair, to receive from them temporarily their commissions of major general, with discretion on their part, at any time during this session of Congress to resume them, was in derogation of the Constitution of the United States, and not within the power of the President and the Secretary of War, or either of them, to make.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire the Senate to take up a bill which I am sure will lead to no debate, and which the Senator from Kentucky wants to have passed as much as I do. If he will yield for that purpose, I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not propose to debate this resolution; I only ask for action on it; but if the bill of the Senator will not displace the resolution, I have no objection to its being taken up.

Mr. ANTHONY. It will not displace this resolution if the resolution be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not before the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have a vote on taking it up.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well; I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Davis, Hailan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Morrill, Nesmith, and Willey—10. ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Fessenden, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Johnson, McDougall, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wright.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no disposition to debate the resolution. I have no doubt every gentleman in the Senate has his opinion formed, and I will content myself simply by asking that the vote be taken upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I propose an amendment as a substitute which I think reaches the subject more accurately. It is to strike out all after the word "whereas," in the preamble of the resolution, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

Frank P. Blair, a major general of volunteers, nominated and appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, did, on the 1st day of January, 1864, tender his resignation of said office of major general, which resignation was by order of the President accepted January 12, 1864, and the said Frank P. Blair informed thereof; and whereas the said Frank P. Blair afterwards, on the 12th day of January, 1864, appeared and qualified as a member of the House of Representatives, and entered upon the duties thereof; and whereas the Constitution expressly declares that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office;" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said Frank P. Blair, by the tender and acceptance of his resignation, and by appearing, qualifying, and becoming a member of the House of Representatives, ceased to be a major general of the volunteer service of the United States, and he is not entitled to the rank and emoluments of that office.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say a word on that proposed amendment. The resolution which I have offered in its preamble quotes all the facts in the language in which the President states them. It has application to the cases both of General Schenck and General Blair, and declares that both arrangements, as recited by the President himself in his communication to the House of Representatives, were in derogation of the Constitution, and that it was not competent for the President or the Secretary of War, both or either of them, to make them. I desire that the resolution shall meet both cases as they have been given in their facts by the President to the House of Representatives. The substitute resolution would be covered and comprehended, I think, entirely in its effect by the resolution which I offered. The other case is not referred to or touched in the substitute resolution, and therefore I think it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to suggest that he is probably aware that General Schenck has repudiated any such understanding.

Mr. DAVIS. The resolution that I offered does not pretend to assert as a fact that such an arrangement was made between General Schenck and the President and the Secretary of War. It does not pretend to decide the question of fact between the President and General Schenck. It merely assumes that the predicate of the facts set forth by the President himself in his official communication, shows a case of an arrangement between General Schenck and himself, which he had no constitutional power to make.

I have no inimical purpose either to General Schenck or General Blair in this proceeding. Both the gentlemen I have known, and for both of them I have a high personal regard. General Blair is a gentleman of fine military mind and of the greatest gallantry. I have no doubt he is eminently qualified for the place that he is now acting in, but I do not believe that he is legitimately and constitutionally in it. If he was, I should be the last person in the Senate to disturb him in possession of it. I only regret that he is not legitimately and constitutionally in it. A gentleman of more gallantry and of more capacity for the command which he is now exercising I have not the pleasure personally of knowing in the Army of the United States. General Schenck's statement I have no reason to distrust. But this is not a blow offered at either of these gentlemen; it is offered at the precedent set by the Administration. If the matter was to terminate here, I should not have moved in it; but we all know that precedent becomes law; and the fact that a precedent is vicious and unconstitutional does not deteriorate from its force and its effect in assuming the authority of law, especially after it has been followed up in a few instances.

All that I desire to do is to meet the position of constitutional power, which the President himself sets forth as having been assumed by him and the Secretary of War, and I merely want the Senate to enter a negative to the existence of that power invested by the Constitution in the President and Secretary of War.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, this preamble sets out certain independent facts, of the accuracy of which I doubt whether the Senate is in a condition at this moment to judge.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to say that if he will look at the communication of the President to the House of Representatives he will find that the facts set forth in the preamble to this resolution are verbatim et literatim the language of the President?

Mr. MORRILL. I am aware of that, and still I have always questioned the propriety of the Senate of the United States, acting with anything like a judicial judgment on the record of the other House, or on a record of any facts which were not found by its own committees. It will be seen by the preamble that there are not only a variety of independent facts stated here which are precedent to the resolution and upon which the resolution is founded, but those facts involve a variety of persons, four parties at least, and three of those parties are not made parties to the record and have not been heard and are not parties to that statement to which the honorable Senator from Kentucky refers, and upon which he bases both his preamble and resolution.

I submit whether it is not a little summary, to say the least of it, that we should pass a resolution which is to be in the form of a judgment to affect the rights of at least three parties who have never made any communication upon the subject and who are not included in any record to which this resolution refers. It occurs to me that the proper way if we are to pass upon a matter of so grave import as this is that it should have at least the consideration of a committee of this body; and I move, therefore, if the motion is in order, that the whole subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that motion.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me the proper committee for it is the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL. It involves certainly a constitutional question.

Mr. SUMNER. Not entirely. There is also a question of military usage under the Government. It seems to me that any other proposition relating to the Army of the United States, or legislation in regard to it, might with equal propriety be referred to the Judiciary Committee. I think it logically goes to the Military Committee.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator will find that in the very phrase of the resolution the Senator from Kentucky invokes the Constitution. The action, he says, was "in derogation of the Constitution of the United States," certainly raising a constitutional issue.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know that I shall object to the reference of the resolution, and of the amendment which I have offered, to the Committee on the Judiciary, or any other committee to which the Senate chooses to send the subject; but the question was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs by a bill introduced by me some days ago. I had prepared this amendment to be reported as a substitute for the original bill, but my committee have not yet acted upon it. As the resolution came up this morning at a time when I did not expect it to come up, I moved the amendment which I had intended to bring before the Committee on Military Affairs to be substituted for the bill that I introduced some days ago.

If it is thought that this subject ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary or any other committee of the Senate for the purpose of more careful examination, and for the purpose of reporting the facts of the case, I shall not raise any objection. It is a very grave matter. There is no question, I think, that the whole proceeding is unconstitutional, a direct and palpable violation of the Constitution. I do not wish to be hasty in action, and I am for the most careful deliberation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems that the Committee on Military Affairs have already had under consideration this subject, and have had it referred to them directly. I myself do not see the propriety of the motion of the Senator from Maine. I do not know that there is any controversy about the facts. He seems to suppose that we should not act without an examination of the facts. If there is anything we can act upon, I should think an official communication from the Executive of the nation to Congress, stating certain facts, embraced all that we need know in order to predicate action here. Does the Senator from Maine mean to summon the President to ascertain whether what he stated in his official communication to Congress is true or not? The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and which was the pending question before the Senate until the Senator from Maine made his motion to refer, states official facts only. Now, what has the committee got to inquire into, I pray, when it goes to the committee? The fact is to be inquired into. What fact is disputed? Is it expected that the committee is to do anything with it?

Mr. MORRILL. Does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know what facts are to be inquired into.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state what occurred to me on the first blush. This preamble makes the Secretary of War and General Schenck parties to a distinct arrangement which is denominated in the resolution "in derogation of the Constitution of the United States." Does the Senator from Illinois understand that there are any facts to authorize such a judgment of the Senate as that? I have not understood that the evidence which the House of Representatives had before them would authorize such a judgment. I do not understand that the House has passed such a judgment. I do understand that the fact is very gravely controverted whether General Schenck had anything to do with the matter at all. So far as he is concerned, he certainly denies it; and yet this resolution involves General Schenck in this difficulty. The President, the Secretary of War, General Schenck and Blair—here are four parties at least equally implicated in what is denominated "in derogation of the Constitution." I ask whether the Senate is in a condition to pass that judgment against these parties unheard? I submit, therefore, to the honorable Senator from Illinois that the fact to be ascertained is, whether any one or all these parties stand in the relation to this transaction in which this resolution seeks to put them.

In regard to the committee to whom it shall go, of course I have no particular preference. I indicated the Committee on the Judiciary because it seemed to me to involve a constitutional question, and I indicated that committee before I knew that the Committee on Military Affairs had had the subject under consideration. I did it for this reason: in passing on so grave a question as this, placing three men, high in position, in the attitude of having made an arrangement which in the judgment of the Senate was a dishonorable arrangement, or an arrangement in contravention of the Constitution, it seemed to me the Senate ought to be cautious of its facts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand, then, that the Senator from Maine denies the truth of the allegations made by the President of the United States, that it involves the Secretary of War. Does he propose that the Senate shall undertake an investigation of a matter of fact between the President and the Secretary of War? Will any committee undertake any such thing? Has it any authority to do it? He says the official statement made to the House of Representatives involves the Secretary of War, and he wants to know the facts as to the persons that are implicated. I wish to know of the Senator from Maine directly if he proposes that a committee of this body shall examine into such a question as that between one of the coördinate branches of the Government and a subordinate officer as to whether the statement he has made is the truth or not? Does the Secretary of War deny it?

Mr. President, I am not to be driven into a defense of the resolution which the Senator from Maine has before him. I do not know that I shall vote for this resolution which has been offered by the Senator from Kentucky. I prefer the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and am disposed to vote for it; but I do not see why this resolution should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate facts or to enter into the investigation of a constitutional question. If there is any constitutional question involved in it upon which the Senator from Maine supposes the Judiciary Committee would throw light, I really do not know what it is.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts quotes the very words of the Constitution. The facts stated in the amendment are the official records of the country. I do not really see what is to be investigated by referring the subject to a committee. It seems to me the speediest way to get rid of it would be to act upon it in the Senate. That would be my view of it. But if it is to be referred to any committee, the Senator ought to make a motion to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs, which has had charge of the subject, if it is to be taken from that committee, from its further consideration. My impression is, it would be better to leave it with the committee that has had charge of it.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator does not understand that the Military Committee has had charge of this particular subject?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; a resolution or bill on this very subject—I believe a resolution—was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs some days ago, as I understand from the chairman. This resolution comes up now offered by the Senator from Kentucky; but it is of the same character as that which has already been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to inquire simply if the motion of the Senator from Maine, if adopted, will refer to the Judiciary Committee the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as well as the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir; it will carry the whole subject there.

Mr. HOWE. I can only say that I hope that reference will be made, and I hope we shall have a very full examination of the subject by the Committee on the Judiciary. It strikes me as being rather a grave matter that it should be asserted publicly and very boldly that a man in military command now of a corps, I believe, is a mere private citizen; and such I understand to be the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, who is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a very grave assertion; and it is a question upon which I should not desire, as a Senator, to commit myself until I am compelled to meet it in some jurisdictional way, and after a very careful examination. The ulterior consequences resulting from such a fact may be very momentous and very melancholy; and I think we ought to know at the earliest possible day whether there is any foundation whatever for such an assertion. I hope the subject will be referred to that committee.

Mr. POWELL. I concur very fully with the views taken by the Senator from Wisconsin. This is a very grave matter, and, in my judgment, it should receive an investigation at the hands of the Committee on the Judiciary, and they should make a report giving their opinion of the law of the case. As to the facts that present themselves in the communication of the President, it is very clear that the President indicates there were arrangements with those two major generals touching their coming into Congress and afterwards resuming their positions in the Army as major generals in the service of the United States. There are grave constitutional questions that present themselves in the cases of both those generals. If General Blair accepted the office of a Representative in the Congress of the United States, that being an office incompatible with the one of major general, the presumption is pretty clear that he vacated the office of major general.

General Schenck, as I understand, was elected in the autumn of 1862 a member of the present Congress. The term of that office commenced on the 4th day of March, 1863. From the proceedings of the House of Representatives it seems that General Schenck stated, in a speech there, if I understood the speech correctly, that he held on to this office of major general up to one or two days before the meeting of this Congress, and that he received the pay of a major general in the Army of the United States up to that time, his office of a member of Congress having commenced on the 4th of March preceding. If he held on to an incompatible office, and received the pay and emoluments of that office for months after his term as a member of Congress commenced, the question arises whether or not he did not by that waive the acceptance of his office as a Representative in the Congress of the United States. That is a very grave constitutional question, one upon which, I confess, I have not a very distinct opinion. I certainly have an impression upon it. As General Schenck, however, is a member of the House of Representatives, it would be probably more proper that the House of Representatives should investigate that matter.

But it is set forth in the resolution of my colleague that the President has acted in violation of the Constitution in both these cases. We, as a part of a coördinate branch of this Government, are the guardians of the public liberties, and it is our duty to look into those infractions of the Constitution. I hold that it is only by a faithful observance of the Constitution that the liberties of the people can be sustained or maintained. I do not think there can be much doubt on the subject as to whether the acceptance of an incompatible office vacates the one held. Upon the very branch of the case that I have mentioned as regards General Schenck, there is greater doubt. But I hold that if the Executive, or any power on earth, infracts the Constitution of this country, it is the duty of this Senate to make manly protest against it. I think this whole question should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they should give it an elaborate investigation, and report to the Senate their opinions, in writing, as to whether the Constitution has been infringed or not. I hope, therefore, that the whole subject will go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that they will make a report upon the case at as early a day as possible.

Mr. MORRILL. I have examined the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts since I made my motion. My remarks were applicable to the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky. I do not think the amendment offered obnoxious to those remarks; certainly not to the general intent which they applied to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. If there is a disposition to vote on the amendment, I am disposed to withdraw my motion of reference to the Committee on the Judiciary for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to refer is withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS. I renew the motion to refer both the resolution and the amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary; and upon that motion I desire to say a single word. The resolution gives rise to a very important constitutional question. The Senator from Massachusetts suggested that the precedents in relation to the practice of the Government should be examined. I suppose that the conclusion or the thought in his mind was that this act of the President could be sustained, but upon that question, I think, there will be very little contrariety of opinion among Senators.

The question suggested by my colleague, however, is a much more important question than that, for the reason that it is much more difficult to decide, I think, and there will be a much greater variety of opinion and judgment in relation to it. That question is this: whether when a man holds a commission as a major general in the Army of the United States, and while he holds that commission and is in the exercise of the office, he becomes a candidate for Congress and he is elected, and after his election to Congress as a member of the House of Representatives he holds on to his commission and executes the duties of the office of major general for five or six months, whether this conduct does not amount to a waiver and a forfeiture of his position as a member of the House of Representatives to which he is elected. I am not prepared to answer that question distinctly satisfactorily to my own mind. It may be the one way or the other; but it is a question of great gravity which in my judgment ought to be investigated and reported upon by the Committee on the Judiciary after the maturest consideration of the subject.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope this resolution and the substitute offered for it will not be referred as now moved by the Senator from Kentucky. If the question stated by the Senator when just up he involved, the question whether General Schenck, while holding a military commission, could or could not become a member of Congress, it appears clear to my mind that that question belongs to the House of Representatives, of which he is a member, and not to the Senate. That inquiry is not pertinent here; and I am utterly opposed to any inquiry upon this subject relating to General Schenck. We know that General Schenck is a member of the other branch of Congress. We also know that he is not in commission as a military officer. The case of General Blair is a very different one. We know that General Blair was a member of Congress. We know that General Blair is now holding a military commission. I see no analogy between the cases; and I would not refer this subject as it now stands or is presented to any committee of this body for investigation. I hope it will not be referred, but that the question will be acted upon by the Senate now in the form in which it is presented by the substitute offered by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I am not anxious to ascertain whether some of the gentlemen, one or more, named in the preamble to the resolution of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, have been or are inconsistent or not. I am willing to leave that where the action of the House of Representatives has placed it, and do not regard such an inquiry as pertinent here. I hope that the Senate will refuse to refer, and will act upon the question as it is presented.

Mr. ANTHONY. I voted to take up this resolution for the very purpose of referring it. I should have made the motion to refer if the Senator from Maine had not done so. I am certainly not prepared to vote for a resolution of censure on the President or either of the generals. I am willing that the matter shall be referred; and then, if the facts and the law are such as have been represented, we can vote accordingly. I am not prepared to vote on it now. I shall vote for the reference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The President has laid, with great frankness, the whole facts before the country in his communication to the House of Representatives, and the country can judge as well as we can in reference to the facts, and therefore I see no necessity for action on that branch of the question unless gentlemen are disposed to press for the expression of a general opinion upon the subject by Congress, which would be in the nature of a vote of censure or something of that sort. So far as regards General Schenck or any understanding that may have been had with him, we have nothing to do with the question, because General Schenck has not been either again nominated or put in command.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the special order, the time for its consideration having arrived.

General SENATORS. Let us go on with this resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If by consent of the Senate this resolution be continued, it will not take me two minutes to say what I desire to say.

Several SENATORS. Go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order will be laid aside informally, if there be no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The question stands very differently, in my judgment, in regard to General Blair. It is admitted that he has been put in a high military command, and been put in that command by virtue of the commission which he held previous to a certain period, that is to say, the period when he became a member of this Congress by taking the oath and qualifying himself accordingly; and on the facts it also appears that General Blair had resigned that commission, and that his resignation had been accepted. With that we have something to do, while we have nothing to do with the question so far as General Schenck is concerned, he being a member of the other House; and if any question such as is suggested by the honorable Senator from Kentucky arises in his case, it is to be judged by the other House. General Blair, however, being actually in command as an officer, and in high command, we have something to do with his case, because whether a man is major general or a brigadier general depends upon our confirmation as well as upon the President's nomination; and therefore it is not only our right but it becomes our duty to look into that subject if we know the fact, and we cannot help knowing the fact, because the whole of it is contained in a communication under the signature of the President, admitted and stated by him to Congress. We have a right, and it is our duty to take notice of the fact as it exists, and to inquire whether he is a major general in the service of the United States; and, as I have before remarked, it depends upon us as well as upon the President, in the first instance, whether he is a major general in the service of the United States. I think it very proper, therefore, that we should investigate that matter, and in view of the simple position which I have stated, of course I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the original resolution, because it is confined to the matter which it is proper that we should inquire into, and is direct upon that subject.

Whether the question is to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary or not, Senators will decide according to their own wishes and judgment. For myself individually, I should not vote to refer it, because I am perfectly clear in my own mind that, on each of the grounds stated in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, General Blair clearly is not an officer of the United States. When he resigned his commission, and that resignation was accepted without qualification, he ceased to be a major general, and he could not be made a major general again without our permission.

Again, when he qualified himself as a member of the House of Representatives, under the constitutional provision he ceased to be a major general, if he had not ceased before, and, in my judgment, he could not become a major general again without our consent and advice.

Being perfectly clear on both these points, I have no wish for a reference of the subject to any committee whatever, but am prepared to vote for the resolution at any moment.

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. I must insist on the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order will be taken up, being Senate bill No. 114.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Can we not vote on this resolution? Does anybody want to speak?

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to a vote being taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution may be continued before the Senate by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor on the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I want to ask a question of order. If this consent is given, does it extend all day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The Chair will call up the special order at the termination of this debate.

Mr. NESMITH. I only desire to make one or two remarks on this matter. Whatever constitutional question may be involved, a usage has grown up in the Departments of this Government in connection with the subject of action on resignations; and for that reason I should like to have the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, instead of our proceeding at once to condemn the course that has been pursued by the Secretary of War and the President in this instance. There are ample precedents, I think. I can name one which I have now in my mind's eye. Under the administration of General Jackson, an officer of the artillery resigned. Some five or six months after his resignation was accepted his company was here in Washington. The commanding officer of it was taken sick, and the company being ordered to Florida, General Jackson permitted that officer, who had resigned five or six months before, to withdraw his resignation and take command of the company. He did so, and went into the Florida campaign, and served as an officer of the regular Army of the United States without any resubmission or reconfirmation by the Senate. There are a great many instances of that kind, I think, in the history of the Government. The President and the Secretary of War may have acted with reference to those precedents; and before a condemnation is pronounced on them, I should like to have the subject referred to a committee, in order that an investigation may be had into the precedents.

Mr. JOHNSON. I happened to be at the War Department a few days ago when an application was made by one who had been in the military service of the Government to be reappointed a captain, who had resigned, and whose resignation had been accepted; and after the interview between that officer and the Secretary had terminated I told the Secretary that I did not understand how it could be done, and wanted to know what the law was in his opinion. Without expressing any opinion himself about the law, he told me that the usage had been unbroken; where a resignation was accepted and the officer was willing afterwards to go into the service, and the President was willing to accept his services again, the President canceled the resignation and the individual was considered as again in office. He mentioned four cases; I cannot recollect the names of all of them. One was the present Brigadier General Meagher, who resigned, and whose resignation was accepted, and he was out of the service nearly a year, I believe, or eight or nine months; and upon the death of General Corcoran, who commanded the division in which Meagher was, he applied to be reinstated, and it was done. Three other cases he mentioned where parties had been out of commission, one of them I think for a year or two years, and, as I understood him, so far as he was advised of what had been the practice of the Government from the beginning up to the present Administration, that had uniformly been done. As we know, every day during the existence of the present war, officers have been dismissed the service by the President under the act which authorized him to dismiss without giving any reason, and they have been dismissed on the decisions of courts-martial, and over and over again—indeed there is hardly a paper that does not tell us the fact—he has reinstated them.

I confess for myself, speaking individually and without regarding at all what has been the usage, I do not exactly see that the usage has the sanction of law. The Secretary seemed to suppose that there might be a difference between the case of Major General Blair, to which I particularly adverted, and the other cases that had arisen. That difference he supposed might be found in the fact of his having qualified as a member of Congress, which of itself, by virtue of the Constitution, would put him out of office, and over that perhaps the President had no control. My answer to him was that that perhaps might make an exception, but I did not exactly see how an officer who was out of the service—

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the honorable Senator from Maryland if he knows of any precedent where a military officer had accepted an incompatible office.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was the very matter I was speaking of when the Senator interrupted me.

Mr. DAVIS. I could not hear you.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was my fault. What he stated was, that perhaps what occurred in General Blair's case might present the question in a different form. Acceptances of resignations by the President, as I understood him, were always considered as a matter between the officer and the President. He might refuse to accept, or after accepting he might rescind the acceptance with the consent of the officer and place him again in the service. The difficulty in Major General Blair's case was that his acceptance of a seat in the other House under the Constitution of itself might operate to end his commission in the Army; and if so, there might in that fact be found a difference in his case such as would not be covered by what had been the usage. My answer to that was, without contesting the inquiry whether there was or was not to be found in that fact a difference, that I did not see that an officer who was once out of the service could be put into the service again, more than it would be in the power of the President to appoint to office himself, without consulting the Senate, a person who had never been in office. But as the Secretary of War told me, and I have no doubt he spoke accurately, as he spoke after examining the files of the Department, the usage had been uniformly to the contrary. Officers who have been out of service for three or four years have been permitted to withdraw their resignations and have been put in.

The same practice has prevailed in the Navy Department. It was not done in the particular case to which I am about to allude; but after Captain Buchanan, who has behaved so badly in every way, and bad as was his original act when he resigned his commission in the Navy, being then in command of the navy-yard here and expecting an attack, as everybody did who was in the city at the time, that night or the next day, still worse, persuaded all the officers at the navy-yard to resign, every one of them, except the present Admiral Dahlgren, he first got Surgeon Pinckney to write a letter to me. I was here during the whole of those troubles. I had been very intimate with Buchanan and really had a very high opinion of him, and I did not dream until it was done that he was capable of acting in that way. He got Pinckney to write a long letter to me requesting me to see the Secretary of the Navy and get permission to withdraw his resignation, and in that letter Pinckney said he wrote as he was authorized—and I have no doubt he was, for he was a man of unquestioned veracity and high honor in every way—that under no possible circumstances would he ever raise his arm against the Government under whose flag he had fought so long and which had showered upon him so many honors. Not satisfied with writing the letter, to which I replied by saying that I did not think it could be done, he got Surgeon Pinckney to come over in person to renew the request, and I went to the Department, not, I confess, with a view to urge it, because I would not have done it if I had been the Secretary, and said so to the Secretary; but I did not find that the Secretary thought there was any difficulty in the matter so far as the question of law was concerned. He said what he did say precisely upon the same authority upon which the Secretary of War spoke, that is to say, that the usage of the Department had been to allow resignations to be canceled in that way, and I think several cases have occurred in the Navy in which that usage has been conformed to. For one, I repeat that I confess I do not see how it can be legally done, but I may be mistaken as to that.

Under these circumstances, however, I submit to the Senate whether it is not due to the President and to the War Department that the question itself should be examined by some committee, and that we should come, if we can come, to such an opinion as, while it may perhaps settle the usage in the future, will not cast a slur upon the President or upon the Department. I have no doubt that in acting as they did in this and in the other cases they acted under a full belief that they were authorized so to do.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I wish to state in a word the view I entertain of this question. I do not understand what the Senate have to do, strictly speaking, with this matter. These officers are either legally in commission or they are not. The question is strictly a legal question. These men have an office in their commissions. Their commissions are in their hands, and they can only be taken away from them by the decisions of some legal tribunal upon a proper question being raised. We may differ. Some Senators may suppose these officers are entirely wrong in attempting to exercise the authority conferred upon them by the commissions. Others may think the contrary. If we pass either of these resolutions we only give our opinion, which can have no other effect than to influence the mind of a co-ordinate branch of the Government by what they possibly may consider an improper interference. So it strikes my mind. I am willing at all times to assume the responsibility either by the way of legislation or in any other way upon appointments properly made to the Senate to vote as I think right and proper; but I do not know why I should be called upon merely to express my opinion upon a question which is not to be binding, and ought not to be binding, except so far as the President may consider it as advisory, and he shall be influenced by it.

This is the view I take of the matter; and why should we refer it to a committee to have a report upon it? We are not asked by the President, who confided this commission to General Blair, for our opinion. It is not the case of a new appointment where the Senate have a constitutional right to advise in relation to the propriety or the impropriety of the appointment; but it is the case of an officer in commission at the head of a corps on the field of battle. The Senate here volunteer to pass a resolution or to enact a law legislating a man out of his position, to take away the question from the judicial tribunals of the country and undertake to settle it ourselves. That is the way in which it strikes me. Therefore I am opposed to the proposition, although I may entertain the view, and do, in relation to one of the parties, that a majority of Senators do, that the party is not legally in the service.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I shall vote first for the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, because I think it presents the question more plainly and distinctly than the original resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, and it confines the question exclusively to the case of Major General Blair. I do not think that the Senate have anything to do with the question as it relates to General Schenck. But it is quite apparent from what has been already said on this subject that there are considerations of constitutional law of great weight, not to say perplexity, connected with the issue, and I think that it is due not only to the executive branch of the Government, but to ourselves firstly and principally, that we should not act without full and complete deliberation on a question of so much gravity and importance. I confess, for one, that I have been all along under the same impression with the honorable Senator from Maryland in regard to the effect of a resignation of a commission. I have supposed that the tender of a resignation by an officer, whether civil or military, to the President and its acceptance by the President, terminated the incumbency of that officer completely, and that he was no longer an officer, and could not be restored to his place without a reappointment in due form of law. I may be mistaken as to this. It may be that there has been a usage prevailing with the Executive Government of so long standing, and therefore so important, as to give a practical construction to the Constitution in this regard. If there be such a usage the Senate ought certainly to be willing to take cognizance of it and ascertain what it is, how old it is, and to what cases it applies, and what its effect is. We ought to be fair to all parties concerned in this matter, and I shall therefore vote to refer this question to a committee for the very purpose of having the whole subject fully and carefully investigated; but I must at the same time say that I do not place so much weight on the objection that Major General Blair took his seat in the House of Representatives as some other Senators seem to do. As at present advised, I do not, I must confess, perceive that his taking his seat in the House of Representatives necessarily terminated his commission as a major general ipso facto, in and of itself, without any further act. I wish to be enlightened on that particular point. I wish to consider the question deliberately whether the act of the officer, situated as he was, of taking his seat in the House of Representatives did of itself terminate his office. The Constitution declares that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." One point is taken, if I understand it properly, to this effect: that Major General Blair if he had not previously resigned his office to the President would, on taking his seat in the House of Representatives, by that act have terminated his office of major general. I say that I am anxious to be enlightened on that question of constitutional law. I am not, I must confess, at this time prepared to say that that simple act did terminate his office of major general; and, situated as the whole question is, I think, in fairness to the Executive Government and out of a proper regard to ourselves, we ought to investigate both the usage and the question of law by a committee properly organized.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, lest I should be misunderstood in withdrawing my motion for reference, I desire to say now, if I did not state then, that my object in withdrawing the motion was that we might vote on the amendment with a view of moving a reference of the question upon that subject instead of the subject in its present condition; and I am satisfied from what has been said here this morning that we ought not to consider this question without reference to a committee. It is too grave a matter, in my judgment, after what has been stated as the uniform action of the Government, to pass a resolution of the character even of that presented by the chairman of the Military Committee.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, when the war commenced it was the judgment of the Administration that a member of Congress could not be appointed a general in the service without vacating his seat. A general's commission was offered, I think, to Colonel Baker, but he, wishing to retain his seat in the Senate, did not accept it. He acted simply as a colonel under the appointment, I believe, of the Governor of Pennsylvania. I know that there were other cases where the question came up, and it was decided that a member of Congress could not be appointed a general without losing his seat in Congress. That decision was in harmony with the provisions of the Constitution.

Sir, it appears that General Blair resigned his commission as major general early in January, I think on the 1st day of January. On the 12th day of January his resignation was accepted by the President, and he was notified of that acceptance. On that same day he was sworn in as a member of the House of Representatives. If he had not resigned as major general, the moment he was sworn in as member of the other House his commission would have been vacated. There cannot be any doubt of that. On a call of the Senate for a list of the generals, General Blair's name was returned to the Senate as having resigned, and all the vacancies were reported as filled. We had the whole number of seventy major generals, without including him, and his name was put on the list as having resigned. In fact, the Administration informed the Senate, in answer to the resolution of inquiry, that we had seventy major generals, all that the law allowed, and that General Blair was not counted among the seventy major generals. He occupied a seat in the House of Representatives for several months, and has not yet resigned it. He left his seat in the House of Representatives a few days since, and his commission was handed back to him, and he has gone to Missouri, if not to the field. Now, the question is, had the President the authority to hand him back his commission after he had resigned it and taken an office made incompatible by the Constitution of the United States?

I think the question of resignation and the question raised as to the practice of the Government are matters of trifling moment. I apprehend that on investigation Senators will find that a case like this has never arisen in the history of the country where a military officer has taken an incompatible office and his place has been filled in the service, and then his commission has been handed back to him without submitting his name to the Senate for confirmation. Important principles are involved; and if my amendment be adopted, which really brings before us the only matter we can inquire into, I shall have no objection to its going to the Committee on the Judiciary.

As to the question in regard to General Schenck, whatever conversations may have been had in regard to his resigning his seat and returning to the military service, he does not propose to accept any commission or to go back into the service unless his name goes before the Senate. He does not claim his commission back again. There is no question that has arisen in regard to the case of General Schenck, and there is nothing to inquire into. My amendment, therefore, presents the only question that is at issue. That question before the committee will be, if we refer it, whether a general in the service of the United States can resign his commission, have that commission accepted, be notified of its acceptance, accept a seat in the Senate or House of Representatives, and then, after his place in the service has been filled, resume his commission at the will of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to refer the resolution and amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Fessenden, Harlan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Grimes, Harding, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, and Wright.

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

D. FITZGERALD AND J. BALL.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate, bill S. No.

244, for the relief of Daniel Fitzgerald and Jonathan Ball, which was passed by the Senate on the 11th instant, and sent to the House for its concurrence.

A message was afterwards received from the House of Representatives returning the bill; and a motion of Mr. CHANDLER to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was received and entered.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill of the House of Representatives (No. 40) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendment of the House to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate to the said bill; and

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendment of the House to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate thereto, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. SUMNER, and Mr. COWAN.

OFFICIAL ARMY REPORTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. No. 21) to provide for the printing of official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States. The amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause, and in lieu thereof insert the following substitute:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Superintendent of Public Printing with copies of all such correspondence, by telegraph or otherwise, reports of commanding officers, and documents of every description in relation to the existing rebellion, to be found in the archives of his Department, since the 1st day of December, 1860, to the present time and during the continuance of said rebellion, which may be, in his opinion, proper to be published; which said correspondence, reports, and documents shall be arranged in their proper chronological order.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Superintendent of Public Printing shall cause to be printed and bound (in addition to the usual number) ten thousand copies of such correspondence, reports, and documents in volumes of not exceeding (as near as may be) eight hundred octavo pages each, which shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Senate as follows, to wit: five hundred copies to the War Department; one complete copy to each State library of every State in the Union, and five complete copies to public libraries in each congressional district of the United States, to be designated by the Representatives of the present Congress from such district; and of the remaining copies, three thousand shall be for the use of members of the present Senate, and six thousand for the use of members of the present House of Representatives.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That it shall also be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause a complete index of the matter contained in each volume to be prepared and inserted therein.

Sec. 4. And be it further resolved, That all resolutions adopted by either House of Congress at its present session directing the printing of any of the correspondence, reports, or documents as above contemplated, be, and the same are hereby, rescinded.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senate will concur in this amendment. I am sure it will save money and will make the publications uniform; it is the best amendment we can possibly adopt. After the Senate passed the original resolution I received a communication from the Superintendent of Public Printing, Mr. Deffrees, suggesting this amendment, with a view to make the publications uniform and to save money, and it will save many thousands of dollars and make all the publications of war reports uniform and keep them all together. I sent his letter with the amendment to a gentleman in the House of Representatives, and this amendment I understand has received the unanimous, or nearly so, sanction of the House of Representatives. I believe it is right, and I hope the Senate will concur in it.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if there is any provision here for some one to compile these reports. I notice that in the reports that have been published there are a great many errors. They are apparently typographical errors, but they originated in the bad copying of the reports. There are geographical errors; for instance, describing one county by a name that has no existence, and rivers by names that are not known in any geography in the world. There ought to be some provision made by which these reports, when they are printed at such great expense to the public, should be accurately printed. I do not know whose business it is to read them or prepare them. Of course, there is a proof-reader who compares the manuscript with the printed text, but I do not know who revises them, or if there is any one. I want to know if there is any provision of that sort.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think, strictly speaking, there would be a provision of that kind. There is a provision appropriating a certain amount of money to aid the Adjutant General's department in having the work performed and copying done. I think that is all that is necessary in that respect.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was concurred in.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. If it be in order I will move to take up Senate bill No 132, with a view to make it the special order of the day for Wednesday next at one o'clock. It is the Pacific railroad bill as amended by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. HALE. Will the order of the day lose its place by that motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will depend on the pleasure of the Senate. It may not, if the Senate agree by unanimous consent to lay it aside with a view to take up the bill indicated by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HALE. I hope, then, that the Senate will not consent to it. I gave way an hour ago for the Senate just to take a vote and no debate, and here I am.

Mr. CONNESS. There will be no debate on this.

Mr. HALE. Well, if there will be no debate upon it I will not object.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow me to take up this bill.

Mr. HALE. I will agree to it.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 132) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same, for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

Mr. HOWARD. I now move that it be made the special order for Wednesday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION TO WIDOW OF GENERAL WHIPPLE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now resume the consideration of the special order.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution for the purpose of reference.

Mr. HALE. I cannot give way. I have given way all day, and if I continue to yield, I might give way all night.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It is merely for reference.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Kansas will excuse me when I point him to the clock. I wish the Secretary to read the bill that is now under consideration.

The Secretary proceeded to read, as follows:

Senate bill No. 114 to amend section five of an act entitled "An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington," approved May 17, 1846, and further to preserve the elections and guard against the abuse of the elective franchise by a registration of electors for the city of Washington in the District of Columbia—

Mr. HALE. That is not the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the special order.

Mr. HALE. The special order for to-day was the bill granting a pension to the widow of General Whipple.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must beg the Senator's pardon. The unfinished business of the last sitting of the Senate overrides that special order, and Senate bill No. 114 is the business before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Then I move to postpone that bill in order to proceed to the consideration of the special order assigned for to-day at one o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that this bill, which is the unfinished business, is of a public character, while the Senator's bill is strictly of a private character. The consideration of this bill has been urged for several weeks; and I am told it is of the utmost consequence that it should be acted upon at once. It relates to the election in this city, which is to take place in the beginning of the next month. I hope, therefore, the Senator will see the propriety of disposing of it at once, and not interposing any motion that would delay action upon it.

Mr. HALE. I know that that is a public bill; but I wish to state to my friend from Maine that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] who moved the amendment to it which is now pending, was under the necessity of leaving town on Saturday night, but expects to be back again this evening; and I think it would be uncourteous to him to call up his bill when he is necessarily absent, especially as he is to be absent but a single day. I know—for I board with the Senator—that he expects to be back this evening. I trust that will commend itself to the Senator from Maine as a reason for not urging the bill at this present time.

Mr. MORRILL. The bill is in no peculiar sense the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that I know of. It does not come from his committee. He takes particular interest in it.

Mr. HALE. The Senate were engaged in discussing an amendment submitted by him when the bill was last under consideration.

Mr. MORRILL. It was rather a bad time for him to leave while his amendment was pending.

Mr. HALE. I desire to state what the bill is to which I ask the consideration of the Senate. It is a bill granting a pension to the widow of Major General Whipple, who died in battle on the battle-field of Chancellorsville a little more than a year ago. I believe I have the authority of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, as reported in the proceedings in the Globe a little more than a year ago, that from the foundation of the Government it has been the custom for the Congress of the United States to vote pensions similar to this. The Committee on Pensions recommend this year that the action of the Government be reversed. If that policy is to be resorted to, if the pensions that have been granted to the widows and children of generals who have died in a time of peace, and died in bed, are to be denied to the widows and children of those who die in battle, I think it is due to our brave soldiers in the field that the Senate should settle that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to postpone Senate bill No. 114, and take up the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2) granting a pension to Ellen M. Whipple, widow of the late Major General Amiel W. Whipple, of the United States Army, which had been reported adversely by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE. I desire to state now, so that the Senate may understand it, what has been done lately on this subject. On the 7th of May, 1860, the Congress of the United States granted a pension of fifty dollars a month to Mrs. Anne M. Smith, widow of General Persifer F. Smith, and a like pension of fifty dollars a month to the widow of General Macomb, and a like pension of fifty dollars a month to the widow of General Riley. On the 12th of July, 1862, they granted a pension of fifty dollars a month to the widow of General C. F. Smith, and on the 3d of March, 1863, they granted a like pension to the widow of General Stevens, and on the same day a like pension of fifty dollars a month to the widow of General F. H. Plummer. When the pension (which was the first that came up since the war commenced) to the widow of General Smith was under consideration, I entered my vote against it, as I believe did my friend from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] because we thought it was time that a different rule should prevail and a uniform system be adopted; but the Committee on Pensions reported in favor of it, and the chairman of that committee gave these reasons for passing it, which I will read:

"The allowance for widows of officers by law is one half the pay proper, not exceeding half the pay of a lieutenant colonel in any case. One half the pay proper of an officer in the grade in which he was, not exceeding that of a lieutenant colonel, is allowed. The widow of a major general would get thirty dollars a month; and that is the provision made by a bill which has come to us from the House, and is reported back from the committee—a general law which has not been acted on by the Senate. That is in conformity to previous laws, and this action of the committee was taken by them in view of the fact of the general law, and that this was more than the amount granted by the general law, because such appears to have been the action of Congress during the whole existence of the Government."

And that was, as I understood it, to pay this pension to the widows of officers slain in battle. Now, sir, General Smith—and I have not a word to say against the justice of that pension, and had not at the time, except as to the policy of it—did not die in battle, and several of the officers whose names I have read did not die in battle. General Whipple died in battle on the field of Chancellorsville; and I think I hazard nothing in saying that a brave officer never drew his sword on the field of battle. General Whipple was brave, not with the impulsive rashness of some men, but he was brave from Christian principle, believing that upon the field of battle was his place and line of duty, and that it lay with Providence to send him life or death, and he was equally prepared for either. He died, I think, within forty-eight hours after the time he was wounded. He left a widow and three children, all minors. He left them little but an unblemished reputation, an untarnished honor, and the regards of the country that he had served so well. He left his widow and children in the confidence and hope, which I trust is not to be disappointed, that while he laid down his life for his country, all that he left behind him that was most dear in life would be cared for by that country, as the country had been accustomed to take care of widows and orphans similarly constituted.

Sir, it may be said that our expenses are great and it becomes us to be economical. I grant it. I know that our expenses are great and overwhelming; but I tell you, sir, this is the very last place that the hand of economy should touch. It is the last place where the country can afford to be parsimonious, or even prudent. What will be the effect to-day, while our country is engaged in this struggle for life or death, if we proclaim to the brave men who have gone out with a heroism never surpassed and rarely equaled, taking their lives in their hands and laying them down as freely as occasion presents—what will be the effect of telling them that Congress, amidst the lavish and profuse expenditure of the public Treasury, have seen fit to commence the work of economy, and to commence it in withholding the competence which they have been accustomed to give to the widows and children of the brave officers who have laid down their lives in their behalf? I trust that a statement of this case is enough to secure the passage of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a novel and would be a painful position to me to oppose a bill granting pensions to the widows of officers or soldiers who have fallen in battle in the service of the country. I do not propose doing it. As I cannot vote for this bill, I propose saying a very words in reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, lest it should seem that I was abandoning a policy which I had previously advocated.

It is true, sir, that prior to the present war, Congress has been in the habit, on the applications of widows of general officers, to increase the pensions provided for them by law, and in some cases I believe even to grant pensions where the law provided none. There were several cases, I think the honorable Senator referred to three which occurred in the year 1860, where the widows of three major generals were pensioned by act of Congress at the rate of fifty dollars per month, when the pension provided by law was but thirty dollars for widows of officers of the very highest rank, thus adding twenty dollars per month to the amount provided by law. The honorable Senator quotes from remarks made by me at that time or soon after, where I said that such had been the general or uniform policy of the Government. I presume I made some examination at that time, and was probably in my own judgment warranted in making that assertion. I could not from my recollection now state such to have been the fact, although I recollect nothing which would show it to be otherwise.

When the case of Mrs. Smith, the widow of General Charles F. Smith, was brought before Congress, she being the widow of the first general officer, a major general, who fell in the war, I think, in the fall of 1861, the application went to the committee with which I was connected, and the committee reported a bill in her favor, giving her a pension of fifty dollars a month. I was in favor of it. I was in favor of it in committee, and I was in favor of it on the floor of the Senate. It passed the Senate; it passed the House of Representatives; it became and is a law. Under the same circumstances I should take the same course if the question were now before us. There were peculiar circumstances attending that case. It is true, as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated, that General Smith did not die in battle; but he died very soon after a series of battles of which he was the hero, and died in consequence of injuries received either in battle or in service connected with the battles, and I believe in consequence of injuries in battle. He left a widow and family entirely dependent. He had been in the service between thirty and forty years.

Mr. GRIMES. Forty-one.

Mr. FOSTER. The honorable Senator from Iowa says forty-one years. For forty years certainly he had been in the service of the country, as gallant, as true, and as faithful and able a soldier as we had in our Army. He was brevetted four times for gallantry during the Mexican war. No man stood higher on the roll of the Army: no man was more deserving; and he laid down his life after a series of brilliant victories, of which, I repeat, without disparagement to other brave men, he was the hero. Under these circumstances, his widow, dependent, without means, came before Congress for aid for herself and her fatherless children. I admit I supported her claim for a pension of fifty dollars per month. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire opposed it; he was not in favor of it. We undoubtedly were respectively governed by our views of what was our duty and what was proper under the circumstances. At that time I did not foresee how wide would be the ravages of this war; I did not foresee how many brave and gallant men would fall, leaving widows and children to be provided for by the country. Had I done so, I am not prepared to say that I should have been at that time willing to increase the amount provided by law for the widow of General Smith. The amount provided by law was thirty dollars per month, and that continues the law at the present time.

Two years more have passed away; great has been the bloodshed and slaughter in our battlefields; vast is the number of widows and orphans. The expenditure of money which the Government has been called to make during these years is perfectly immense. It becomes, in my judgment, a somewhat different question from what it was two years ago, whether we shall continue the same amount of bounty which we gave at the commencement of the struggle. The widows of these officers may be equally meritorious; the country may owe their deceased husbands as great a debt of gratitude, but the country is in a very different condition. Our means are diminished and the calls upon the Treasury are greatly multiplied, immensely beyond what anybody could have foreseen.

It is true that we followed the precedent set in the case of Mrs. Smith in the case of the widows of two other generals, the widow of General Stevens and the widow of General Plummer. I have, however, to say—not by any means by way of reproaching any Senator or the Senate—that the committee with which I have the honor of being connected reported against them. I opposed both those bills in committee and voted against them here, but they passed. I did not make strenuous opposition to them; I did not feel it my duty to do so; but I voted against them. Those cases were not, as it seemed to me, like the case of Mrs. Smith. They were meritorious. The husbands of those widows were gallant and deserving men, and deserved the bounty and gratitude of the country. I would be the last surely to say they did not; but the war then extending in its ravages and the calls upon our Treasury then being so great, it seemed to me that we should not extend the policy, and that we must exercise a more sparing hand in dispensing the bounties of the Government.

Such, however, has been the course until the present time; and the bill which is now before the Senate, together with two others of similar character, at an early day of the session was referred to the Committee on Pensions. This bill for the relief of Mrs. Whipple came before the committee without any petition, without any papers connected with it. The committee had no evidence in regard to her condition, whether she was dependent or not. We had no doubt, of course, because we would not be so ignorant of the day and the times as not to know that General Whipple was a gallant and deserving man; but there was no evidence furnished us as to the condition in which he left his family. Whether that family were well provided for or not we had no knowledge. This bill and the other two bills under these circumstances were acted upon by the committee, and we came to a conclusion adverse to their passage, thinking that with the present calls upon the Treasury of the United States we could not as a committee justify ourselves in saying that the amount provided by law for those widows was not as great as we could recommend to have paid.

It is true the honorable Senator from New Hampshire says this is not the day and these are not the times to be niggardly in regard to the surviving widows and families of our officers and soldiers who perish in the field. It is not, Mr. President; surely it is not. It is not, he says, the place to begin; we ought not to begin with them in exercising economy. The principle, however, on which I go, and on which, so far as I understood the views of the committee, they go, is this: that it is the duty of every committee of this body to regard the expenditures which we are called upon to make with very close scrutiny, and not to recommend the expenditure of a dollar unless it shall seem to be imperatively demanded. I suppose that applies as well to the Committee on Pensions as to every other committee. It is true that the cases that come before us make an appeal to the heart which it is difficult to resist; and I trust I have as strong a feeling of sympathy, as strong a desire to relieve the wants of those who have thus been left in sorrow, in loneliness, and perhaps in poverty, as the honorable Senator from New Hampshire or any other Senator; but after all, Mr. President, when these demands are multiplied to such an extent as that it seems impossible our Government can sustain itself, are we not called upon to say so; and, although we may be doing violence to the best feelings of the human heart, must we not say so? I repeat, I suppose the principle on which the Committees of this body and every member of the body should act applies as well to the Committee on Pensions as to every other committee, and if other committees do as I presume they will do—for they surely have as great care of the public interests as the Committee on Pensions—if they act upon the same principle, we shall certainly retrench to some extent our expenditures and relieve our Government somewhat of the overwhelming drafts that are now made upon our resources.

If we adopt and act upon the principles suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, we must go much further. The amount of fifty dollars per month seems a small sum, it is true, to the widow and family of a major general who has fallen in battle; but, sir, what is the amount provided for the widows and families of other persons who fall in the service? Take the privates—and most of the men who fall in the service fall as privates—they, just as brave, just as gallant, just as devoted as the officer of the highest rank, may fall, and do fall daily, in the service, and leave large families entirely dependent, and what is the amount provided by law for the widows and orphan children of soldiers who thus fall in battle? Why, sir, the whole amount is eight dollars per month. That is all that we pay, and I think, under the circumstances, that is all that we can pay. I do not think, with the burdens upon the people which are now upon them, that we can increase that amount and pay a larger sum. If we cannot do that, shall we increase the amount which is to be paid to the widows of general officers from the sum of thirty dollars per month to the sum of fifty dollars? Can we justify ourselves even to our own hearts in so doing?

I know that, from the social position of officers and the expenses of officers' families, as a general rule, it costs more as a matter of necessity to support the widow and family of a major general than it does to support the widow and family of a private in the ranks, and the necessities of the two, therefore, the numbers being the same, may be said not to be equal; one is greater than the other. But while that has been true, and is to some extent true now of our service, it is not true in this war as compared with any former war; that is, it is not true to the same extent; for we have hundreds and thousands of men, privates in our ranks to-day, whose social position compares with that of major generals in the service, and whose widows and children are accustomed to move and do move in the same circle of society precisely in which the widows and children of general officers move.

Under these circumstances, it is by no means either just or generous that we should widen the difference made in the amount of bounty or pension paid by the Government to the widows of officers over and above the amount paid to the widows of privates. If we increase the amount paid to the widows and families of general officers from thirty to fifty dollars per month, we ought, in my opinion, to double the amount paid to the widows and families of privates. The Treasury of the United States would not be adequate to meet the demands. If such an amount is called for from the public Treasury it can be raised only by a tax on the people, and it must come from people as poor and as dependant as those to whom it is paid. In this matter of charity when we collect the money by taxation we ought to think where the fund is to come from. We gather it not from the coffers of the rich, but from the scant earnings of the poor. Our very charity in this case is wrong from the hand of poverty.

Sir, it is easy to talk about liberality, and at times it may be easy to exercise it; it is always grateful to exercise it; but can we exercise it under these circumstances? I submit that we cannot, and that we are not to be reproached with a want of generosity if we do not. It is impossible that we should. Why, sir, the number of applications at the Pension Bureau amount now to from four to five thousand per month, and that, too, before the last battles. They will be doubled now for the next year. Four thousand applications per month at an average of at least $100 for each pensioner makes up an amount which we see is exceedingly heavy. The amount which we shall have to pay in pensions will soon go up to $10,000,000 per annum. At our present rates, not increasing the amount one penny, the Treasury of the United States will very soon be called upon to pay $10,000,000 per annum for pensions, almost as great an amount as was sufficient to carry on this Government within my recollection and yours, sir, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) It is within my recollection that the Government of the United States was administered for four years at an average expenditure of less than thirteen million dollars annually. But, sir, before two years are at an end, with no addition to the pension list except what is now made and is making while I am now addressing the Chair, I think the Treasury will be called upon for $10,000,000 per annum for the payment of pensions alone.

Under these circumstances, Mr. President, with every disposition to go with the Senator from New Hampshire in all that is just and in all that is liberal, it seemed to me we were called to say as to these applications, we could not grant them; but we must let them stand where the law lets them stand, and give to each of these widows her pension of thirty dollars per month, and not increase it to fifty dollars. The fact that we have previously given more, and that this will be a departure from the practice, is answered when we compare our former with our present condition. We cannot, for the sake of being consistent in our precedents, make these additions to the burdens of the country, lest they become too grievous to be borne.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I have no disposition to enter into the discussion of this question; but one single proposition strikes me with some force in this case. This bill is reported adversely by the Committee on Pensions on the ground of economy. I appreciate that proposition and the argument of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of that committee; but as a question of economy it is certainly not a large one. It is only a difference between $600 and $360 per annum in an individual case, and it is here extended to three cases against which reports have been made. If you are to extend it to all the major generals in the Army on the supposition that they will all be wounded or all be killed and so to be entitled to this pension, and that is the extent to which this precedent could go, it will then be seen that as a question of economy it is a very inconsiderable sum. But upon any probable estimate the sum is quite too diminutive, I think, to be raised as a question of economy, and economy against the Treasury of the United State. Take the three cases which have already been passed and the three cases reported upon and the additional sum would be less than $1,500 per annum between granting them the thirty dollars and the fifty dollars per month. I submit, therefore, on the question of economy, that, it seems to me, with all due respect, the sum is too inconsiderable.

Let me say a word upon one other point. It is a departure from the action of the Government in similar cases, if I am right in saying that the question of economy is too inconsiderable; and that, of course, does not afford a reason for the departure. I do not mean to say that the departure would be a reflection on these officers; but certainly if I am right in the argument that it is not justified on the score of economy, it is a reflection. However, the committee do not put it on that ground, and I am not disposed to argue it upon that ground. I wish to make this inquiry: taking the statement of the honorable chairman of the committee on a former occasion, that the uniform action of the Government, from the commencement of the Government down, in parallel cases of this kind, had been to grant pensions of this amount, is the question of economy sufficient to justify a departure from it now? I should hope that the Senate would do in this case as the Government has been accustomed to do heretofore. The argument of the honorable Senator, that if we do it in this case we ought in justice to do it in all the cases of soldiers in the ranks, it seems to me, does not hold, for this reason: we are doing in their cases precisely what we have done from the commencement of the Government. It is no departure from the action of the Government, to give these parties fifty dollars month. It is precisely what we have been doing, and therefore furnishes no argument for the inference that we shall be compelled to raise the pensions in other cases.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that there is a little misapprehension among the members of the Senate as to what has been the practice of the Senate in the granting of pensions to the widows of major generals and brigadier generals. I was here in 1860, when the act was passed for the benefit of Mrs. Persifer F. Smith, Mrs. General Macomb, and Mrs. General Riley; and I remember very well (for I was a member of the Committee on Pensions at that time) the ground on which that bill was passed. It was an omnibus bill, neither one of the pensions having merit and strength enough to carry itself through the Senate and House of Representatives without uniting the friends of the various widows in order to secure its passage. There were some Senators on this side of the Chamber who were favorably impressed with the merits of General Riley. He had been the military Governor in California at the time the constitutional convention was first formed there, and had been instrumental in making it a free State, as they said. General Macomb was the hero of the battle of Plattsburg. General Riley was the general who was said to have won the battle of Chapultepec for us.

Mr. CONNESS. He had command in California.

Mr. GRIMES. He had command in California, and was the military governor there. Those bills were united, and we passed them through here against my vote and against the vote of a majority of the members of the Committee on Pensions.

Then came here next the case of Mrs. Charles F. Smith, the widow of Major General Charles F. Smith. There was this difference between the case now at the bar and the case of Mrs. Charles F. Smith. She was the widow of a major general; Mrs. Whipple is the widow of a brigadier general. Mrs. Smith was the widow of a man who commanded our light artillery during the whole of Scott's campaign in Mexico, and was four times brevetted in the various fights there. He was the hero, as we believe in my State, or at any rate one of the principal heroes, of Fort Donelson. Instead of dying in his bed from disease, he actually died from a wound that he received in the attack upon Fort Donelson, and which he carefully refrained from communicating even to any member of his staff, and it was not known and was not published in the newspapers until about the time of his death.

I have no doubt that General Whipple was an excellent officer; but it seems to me that if we grant this pension now we shall be compelled to do it to the widows of all the other brigadier generals who may be killed in the service. I know nothing to distinguish this case from the two cases to which the Senator from Maine has alluded or to the various cases which have happened in our Army, or the six or eight brigadier generals who have recently been slain in the battle of the Wilderness; and the question recurs, are we prepared to raise the pensions of the widows of brigadier generals at so great a per cent. as from thirty to fifty dollars per month, and if we do raise the pensions of this class of widows, must we not in justice to the widows of other officers, and of the men in the service, raise theirs correspondingly? How can we say to the widows of captains and lieutenants of companies, for whom pensions have been established by the same law that we establish the pension of the widow of a brigadier general, that their pensions are to continue at the pitiful sum of eight dollars a month while you increase the pension of the widow of a brigadier general eighty per cent.? If we are prepared to go where this precedent is going to lead us, I am willing to be as liberal as most men.

The Senator from Maine thought there was not much of a question of economy involved in this measure. There is not in the immediate bill before us, but we are establishing a rule. The precedent that we establish to-day if we should pass this bill will be quoted upon us before we adjourn next month or the month after next. After we have established it in several cases, as we shall do by the passage of this bill, it will become the settled law, the common understanding of the country, that the widow of a brigadier is to have fifty dollars a month in place of thirty dollars. I ask Senators to put the question to themselves how it is possible for us to resist the claims of subordinate officers and their families if we are going to raise at so great a rate the pensions of general officers.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Iowa says there is a mistake as to what the practice of the Senate has been. I do not pretend to know. I only read from the remarks made by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, who, I supposed, understood the matter, and who I suppose still understands the matter, and he says that this has been "the action of Congress during the whole existence of the Government." When that bill was under consideration the Senator from Iowa, who has addressed the Senate in reference to the question of precedent, answered then in anticipation the speech which he makes now. He said:

"It is supposed that each has been accustomed to move in a certain ascending scale socially, and that as their life has increased and their years have increased, their responsibilities to their families and their connections have been increased. I suppose that is the theory on which these grades have been established, and on which we have heretofore raised up the pensions as you proceeded up in rank. As the law now stands, Mrs. Smith would be entitled to only thirty dollars a month, or the pension to which she would be entitled if she was the widow of a lieutenant colonel. Being the widow of a major general, it is proposed to give her a pension of fifty dollars a month, the same pension that has been given by this Senate since I have been a member of it to four different widows of officers, some of them only colonels in lineal rank, no one of whom died in battle, and not one of whom died until some considerable time after he had been engaged in actual service.

"Now, it is said that this will establish a precedent."

I am reading from the speech of the Senator from Iowa, made on June 30, 1862:

"I do not think it will. I am willing, at any rate, to trust myself to decide every individual case that may be presented upon its merits, and not to be led off to grant to every major general's widow or every brigadier general's widow the pension that I would grant to one who is the widow of one of the most meritorious officers in the public service."

Perhaps I shall be accused of moral forgery for not reading the whole of the Senator's speech; but having read all that I think pertinent to the question, I leave it.

Mr. President, I take it for granted that the action of the Government has been uniform in this direction; and that being the case, if it is withdrawn from the widow of General Whipple, it will be taken, and it cannot but be taken, as an invidious distinction against her and against the character of her deceased husband. I have not a word to say against the fame of General Smith, against his merits, against everything that has been said in his behalf. It is said that he served his country some forty years. Mr. President, General Whipple served his country during all the years that he lived, from his boyhood; and if he did not serve it as long as General Smith did, it was because, under the providence of the God of battles, he sacrificed his life for his country before he reached the maturity of years that General Smith attained. That is the only distinction; and if there is any distinction to be raised against General Whipple in that regard, it lies against the providence of God rather than against the character of the man.

Sir, it was my fortune to know General Whipple, to know him somewhat intimately, to know him in his family as well as on the field, and I venture to say, and I will say it in this presence and in the presence of everybody, that a more upright, a more brave, a more conscientious, and a more patriotic soldier never periled his life for his country. He left but very little property. He left a widow and three children, the eldest of whom I think at the time of his death was not more than sixteen years of age. And I ask you, sir, if this is the time and this the case for our nation to enter upon its career of economy and save $240 a year at this moment, at this critical point of our history. What is the picture that we present? After lying in the valley of humiliation and sending up prayers from every hill-side and valley all over the land to the God of battles that He would bare His arm in behalf of our national life and our national salvation, now when the heart of the nation is buoyant, and from every temple, from every cottage, and from every heart, shouts of thanksgiving are going up to the God of battles that He has heard our prayers, bared His arm in our behalf, and is about giving us the victory, giving to our nation new life and new hope, and the country is rejoicing as it never rejoiced before, you propose to give a new cause of thanksgiving to the nation and tell them we have not only achieved a great victory, we have not only received this great boon from the God of battles, but we have entered upon a new and a glorious career of victory, and we have smitten the widow and the orphans of a brave general, and taken from them whose husband and father has sacrificed his life on our behalf the pittance of $240 a year, which we are going to save and put into the national Treasury, and thank God for that also.

Sir, it is said we cannot afford to pay this pension. Let me ask you if we can afford to rob this widow? I do not believe we can. I should be ashamed to meet the widow and orphans of a man who periled and sacrificed his life in our behalf after such an act as this. We are raising the rank and the pay of the officers that are alive. We have done it constantly, and are doing it almost every day; but we forget those that have perished in our behalf. The Senator from Connecticut thinks our pension roll will be $10,000,000. Let it be $20,000,000, let it be $30,000,000 a year, and I tell you the people of this country will pay it gladly, cheerfully, joyfully, rather than have the national character blasted, as it would be blasted by such an act as the refusal to pass this bill would be.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to lay the bill on the table; and I desire, not to indulge in debate, but to remark that I make this motion in order to put a test to the Senate. Our committee will understand if this bill passes that they are instructed to take up these special cases and pass upon them as they arise; otherwise we will adhere to general rules and follow the policy indicated by our reports on this subject.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Salisbury, Wade, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Hale, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Richardson, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wiley—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Harding, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wright.

So the Senate refused to lay the bill on the table.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

WIDOW OF GENERAL BERRY.

Mr. HALE. There are two other bills of exactly a similar character that it was understood were to come up after the one which has just been passed. There will probably be no debate on them, and I now move to take up Senate bill No. 44.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 44) granting a pension to the widow of the late Major General Hiram G. Berry was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of — Berry, widow of Major General Hiram G. Berry, on the pension roll, at the rate of fifty dollars a month, from the 3d of May, 1863, to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the blank be filled by inserting the name Eliza.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That name will be inserted.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIDOW OF GENERAL BAKER.

Mr. HALE. I move now to take up the bill for the relief of the widow of General Baker.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 122) for the relief of Mary A. Baker, widow of Brigadier General Edward D. Baker, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mary A. Baker, widow of Brigadier General Edward D. Baker, on the pension roll, at the rate of fifty dollars a month, from the 21st of October, 1861, to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. WILSON. I do not understand that Colonel Baker was a general in the service of the United States. I believe he was simply a colonel.

Mr. CONNESS. My impression is that he was acting as a brigadier.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that Colonel Baker, who was a member of the Senate, was commissioned as the head of the California regiment, and he was killed leading that regiment into action at Ball's Bluff. He was offered a brigadiership, or rather, I think, a major generalship in the service of the United States, but he never accepted it. I was told at the time that it was tendered to him; but wishing to retain his seat in the Senate of the United States he did not wish to accept such an appointment, as it would vacate his seat here; and he was in reality never a general, but a colonel. There have been hundreds of colonels who have sacrificed their lives in the service of the country during this war, who have left widows, and left them at the pension of thirty dollars a month. If we are to adopt this system in these cases why not in other cases? Here we are taking up and deciding special cases when it seems to me we ought to decide this question on general principles, and I think we are incurring great risks here to-day in the votes we are giving.

Mr. CONNESS. When the Senator from Pennsylvania made a motion that the bill for the relief of the widow of General Whipple lie on the table, and stated that the committee would regard it as a test question in accordance with which they would hereafter recommend the passage of special bills of this character, were it not for the nature of the motion that the Senator made to lay on the table, I would have suggested that the decision of the Senate against the motion of the Senator would rather indicate that the committee should report a general bill on this subject; but these three bills, I believe, are all that are now presented, and as the other two have passed, I think it would be rather invidious to make this an exceptional case.

I think we are not clear on the subject as to whether Edward D. Baker was a brigadier general or an acting brigadier general or a colonel. We do know that his case was a very peculiar one. We do know that he died without estate. We do know that his widow lives, and as the Senate have acted rather on the impulse of generosity to-day in acting on these other cases, and as the case of Baker is one that certainly is a very remarkable one, one that the mind of the country is directed at, and as he served us well in a civil position and in one of the highest in the country, and gave his life, it appears to me that as the bill is now before the Senate it ought not to be passed by. After its passage let the Committee on Pensions propose some general rule in accordance with the wish of the Senate expressed to-day. I hope no exception will be made in this case, and, although it is a case to some extent an exceptional one, the bill will pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to state that at the time of the death of Mr. Baker he was a colonel in the volunteer service of the United States. I do not understand that to the widows of any officers who have died in the service of the United States, except the widows of major generals, has any such pension as this ever been given; and I understand too that in every case that has been presented to the Senate of a major general dying in the service—

Mr. NESMITH. Permit me. I will explain the condition of that. Colonel Baker was in command of a regiment raised in Philadelphia, known as the California regiment. He had some time prior to his death been commissioned a brigadier general; he had that commission on him at the time he fell, but I believe he had never qualified under it. He was colonel in command of his regiment, and he had the commission of a brigadier general in his pocket.

Mr. CONNESS. I will add, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, that this regiment that Colonel Baker conducted to the field was a regiment made up, to a very large extent, of Californians, men who had been in California, and still regarded themselves as Californians; they were organized early here, and did very gallant service. They were not properly a regiment of volunteers in the service of any State, but wished to call themselves Californians, and be known as such. I believe the statement made now by the Senator from Oregon is strictly true. I remember the facts very clearly.

Mr. HALE. I do not know anything about this; but I read from the same speech made by the Senator from Iowa, June 30, 1862: "Since I have been a member of it [the Senate] to four different widows of officers, some of them only colonels in lineal rank," this pension has been accorded.

Mr. GRIMES. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire does not know what lineal rank is. One officer to whom I referred, Colonel Riley, was a colonel in lineal rank, but he was a brigadier general by brevet. General Smith was only a colonel in lineal rank, commanding a regiment of dragoons, but he was a major general by brevet.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that General Smith was a major general, commissioned under a law of Congress passed prior to his death.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865, have met, and after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House concur in the amendments of the Senate to said bill numbered thirteen, fourteen, eighteen, nineteen, twenty, and twenty-four.

That the Senate recede from its amendments to said bill numbered twenty-two and twenty-three.

That the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to said bill numbered one.

That the House concur in the amendment of the Senate to said bill numbered twenty-seven, with the following amendment; and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That out of the appropriation of $750,000 for a floating dry-dock at navy-yard, New York, provided for by the act making appropriations for the naval service of the United States, approved 3d March, 1863, the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to construct one or two dry-docks, as he may deem expedient, at New York and Philadelphia, at $250,000 each, and to expend the balance of said appropriation, if it shall be necessary, to enlarge the sectional docks to a capacity to receive the large vessels now building.

JOHN P. HALE,
P. G. VAN WINKLE,
L. W. POWELL,
ALEXANDER H. RICE,
JAMES E. ENGLISH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (No. 77) relating to Green Clay Goodloe; and

A joint resolution (No. 78) providing for the election of a member of Congress for the State of Illinois by the State at large.

MAIL SERVICE TO BRAZIL.

On motion of Mr. COLLAMER, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil, the question being on the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to insert the words "with the lowest responsible bidder" after the word "contract," in line six, of section two. The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. WILKINSON. I offer the following additional sections as an amendment to the bill:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That whereas the Government of Venezuela, by a contract entered into on the 1st day of May, 1863, by Simon Camancho, consul for Venezuela, in the city of New York, in behalf of said Government, of the one part, and certain citizens of the United States, of the other part, for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to carry the mails and ply between the city of New York and Laguayra, and other Venezuelan ports, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and empowered to accept the terms thereof, on the part of the United States, so far as the same may be applicable, and to enter into a contract with the parties thereto, upon their furnishing good and sufficient sureties for the faithful performance of such contract, for carrying the mails between the ports of St. Thomas, West Indies, and Laguayra, and such other Venezuelan ports as may be deemed expedient, according to the provisions of said contract: Provided, The expense of such service to the United States shall not exceed the sum of $40,000 per year for the performance of semi-monthly trips between said ports, to be paid out of any moneys appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department: Provided further, That the Government of Venezuela will apply and carry out in good faith the terms and conditions of said contract to the route between St. Thomas and the ports aforesaid, according to the conditions therein stipulated.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the two Governments shall be entitled to have transported, free of expense, on each and every steamer, a mail agent to take charge of and arrange the mail matter, to whom suitable accommodations for that purpose shall be assigned.

I have in my possession some statistics in regard to the trade of Venezuela, but I have not got them with me. I have here, however, a contract which has been entered into by the Government of Venezuela with some citizens of the United States in regard to facilities for emigration and mail facilities between the United States and Venezuela. It is proposed by the bill which has been passed by the House of Representatives and is now before the Senate to pay a subsidy of I believe $150,000 a year for opening a line of communication between the United States and Brazil. This line will run by the island of St. Thomas. The original bill provides that the Postmaster General may enter into this arrangement, provided a similar arrangement be entered into by the Government of Brazil. Now, this amendment proposes to extend the amount $50,000 to establish a line to Venezuela, connecting at the island of St. Thomas with the line from New York to Brazil. The only difference between the two cases is that the Government of Venezuela has already made the offer and entered into a contract. I have the papers in my hand. If it is wise and proper to grant a subsidy of $150,000 in order to open a business with Brazil; it is also wise, I apprehend, to vote a smaller sum in order that we may be enabled to control the trade of Venezuela. I have some very interesting statistics on this subject which I did not bring to the Senate with me, not knowing that the bill would come up to-day. If the theory of the bill is correct I do not see why it does not apply to the amendment. I suppose there will be really very little objection to the amendment, and I shall not consume time by speaking upon it.

Mr. COLLAMER. When we have a particular measure in hand and believe it to be well founded and of importance to the country, and when it has been approved and passed by one House of Congress, it is very embarrassing to have another project thrust upon it by way of amendment, no matter what its merit may be. If it has so much merit, it can certainly go in a bill by itself, without being made to ride another bill which has already passed through one House and been there fully considered.

I do not desire to say very much in relation to the proposition to establish a line to Venezuela. I do not say that it has not some merit in it, but it is infinitely less important than a line to Brazil. But that is not the main difficulty. I made some remarks the other day in relation to the true merit of the proposed enterprise. I had but very little attention then; I have still less now; I did not expect much attention to it; but there are one or two features that bear on the amendment now proposed.

In the first place, in initiating anew the giving of subsidies to steam lines, (of the merit of which I have already spoken, and it is probably not very important to repeat what has been said,) two or three features were considered as important to be incorporated into the measure, distinguishing it from the former experiments. One is that when we enter upon the grant of a subsidy for a steam line, it should go to a country which will join us in the experiment, so that we have a greater expectation of success. Again, all the former contracts for mail steamship service with the Collins line, and the Sloo line, and the Harris line, and all the different lines we had, were set up under acts of Congress which were granted personally to the individuals by name—favours granted, if they were favours, to particular companies or particular men or particular sets of men named in the bill. This constituted a great objection to those enterprises. In order to avoid all this in the setting up of this enterprise to Brazil, the bill particularly contains provision that the Brazilian Government shall contribute its proportion with this Government to the sustaining of the line; and it is also provided that the matter shall be public, and bids shall be invited by advertisements in the various cities, so that opportunity shall be given to full and fair and free competition. These two important features, which are different from those that characterized the lines formerly set up, are regarded as very important in this measure, and without them it is not expected that it will pass. In this shape it has been passed by the House of Representatives.

A word now in relation to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota. In the first place, it is introducing a third party. The bill as passed by the House of Representatives proposes that two Governments, Brazil and the United States, shall be the parties to sustain this enterprise. It is now proposed to put in a third party, the Venezuelan Government. This is what is commonly called the tertium quid, the third quality, the disturbing thing in the measure, defeating the simplicity of the original enterprise, which was thought important to its success.

There is still another objection. The gentleman states, and indeed has it in this amendment, that a contract has been entered into between the Venezuelan Government and certain individuals, I do not know that he named them, in New York. I do not know by what authority a consul can bind his Government by any such treaty as that. Consuls have no power to make treaties and contracts, and I do not understand that this has been done by any authority but the Venezuelan consul.

Mr. WILKINSON. He was authorized directly to do it by his Government.

Mr. COLLAMER. That was not stated before.

Mr. WILKINSON. The Government authorized him to make the contract.

Mr. COLLAMER. Suppose that to be so. You will observe the moment you put this proposition into this bill, the only men who can bid for the proposed service are the men who have got this contract. It does not do any good to have the offer set up for all the world to come in and compete and bid, because these men are the only men who have the contract; they shut out everybody else. Of course that important feature of the bill intended to throw it open entirely to public competition is utterly defeated by this amendment.

I do not wish to say any more about it or take more time on the amendment. I have stated my objections. I will say further that it was before the committee, fully considered by the committee, and not entertained by them.

Mr. WILKINSON. The Senate is very thin, and I should like to have the amendment printed and not have the vote taken on this proposition until there are more members in the Senate, and I ask that the bill may go over and the amendment be printed. I do not want to delay this bill. I am willing to take it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no sort of objection to that arrangement, provided the gentleman will be in and help me to get it up.

Mr. WILKINSON. I will do so at any time to-morrow.

Mr. COLLAMER. I cannot succeed alone here, and especially when I have to wait for him to come in in the morning to get any chance to get at it. If the gentleman will help me to get it up, I shall have no objection.

Mr. WILKINSON. I will help to have it up to-morrow or at any time.

The amendment was ordered to be printed, and the motion to postpone the bill until to-morrow was agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 253, which has been unanimously reported by the Naval Committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No.

253) to amend the act of the 21st of December, 1861, entitled "An act to further promote the efficiency of the Navy," was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the first section of the act of December 21, 1861, shall not be so construed as to retire any officer under the age of sixty-two years whose name shall not have been borne on the Navy Register for a period of forty-five years after he had arrived at the age of sixteen years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army. The amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert:

That on and after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1864, the pay of all private soldiers in the military service of the United States shall be sixteen dollars per month. And from that date, also, the pay of non-commissioned officers shall be increased as follows: corporals shall receive eighteen dollars per month; sergeants, including commissaries and quartermasters' sergeants, twenty dollars per month; orderly sergeants, twenty-four dollars per month; and sergeant majors, twenty-six dollars per month.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Army ration shall hereafter be the same as provided by law and regulations on the 1st day of July, 1861: Provided, That the ration of pepper prescribed in the eleventh section of the "Act to promote the efficiency of the corps of engineers and of the ordnance department, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall continue to be furnished as heretofore. But nothing contained in this act shall be construed to alter the commutation value of rations as regulated by existing laws.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting the public property," approved July 22, 1861, as provides that each company officer, non-commissioned officer, private, musician, and artificer of cavalry, shall furnish his own horse and horse equipments, and shall receive forty cents per day for their use and risk, is hereby repealed, except only so far as the same may hereafter be made to apply and relate to mounted troops called into the service of the United States for a term not exceeding six months.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the pay of clerks of paymasters in the Army of the United States shall be $1,200 per annum.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the thirty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as that an officer may have, when allowed by order of his proper commander, leave of absence for other cause than sickness or wounds, without deduction from his pay or allowances: Provided, That the aggregate of such absence shall not exceed thirty days in any one year.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the first section of this act shall terminate and expire at the end of the present rebellion.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this bill are hereby repealed.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill S. No. 145, report as follows:

Strike out the first section of the amendment of the House, and insert as follows:

That on and after the 1st day of May, 1864, and during the continuance of the present rebellion, the pay per month of non-commissioned officers and privates in the regular Army and volunteers and drafted forces in the service of the United States shall be as follows, namely: sergeant majors, twenty-six dollars; quartermaster sergeants of cavalry and artillery, twenty-three dollars; of infantry, twenty dollars; first sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, twenty-four dollars; sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, twenty dollars; sergeants of ordnance, sappers and miners, and pontoniers, thirty-four dollars; corporals of ordnance, sappers and miners, and pontoniers, twenty dollars; privates, first class of the same corps, eighteen dollars; privates, second class, of the same corps, sixteen dollars; corporals of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, eighteen dollars; chief buglers of cavalry, twenty-three dollars; buglers, sixteen dollars; farriers and blacksmiths of cavalry and artificers of artillery, eighteen dollars; privates of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, sixteen dollars; principal musicians of artillery and infantry, twenty-two dollars; musicians of artillery and infantry, and musicians of sappers and miners, and pontoniers, sixteen dollars; hospital stewards of the first class, thirty-three dollars; hospital stewards of the second class, twenty-five dollars; hospital stewards of the third class, twenty-three dollars.

After the second section of the amendment of the House insert the following:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That hereafter rations shall not be issued to soldiers sick in hospital, but commutation of rations shall be allowed and paid into the hospital fund, at the rate now established by law, for each soldier reported by the surgeon in charge as sick in hospital; and the receipt of the surgeon in charge shall be a sufficient voucher for the paymaster, or other disbursing officer, who may be charged with the payment of such commuta-

tion: Provided, That the hospital fund shall be devoted solely to the diet and maintenance of the sick and wounded soldiers in such hospital: And provided further, That the Surgeon General shall, with the approval of the Secretary of War, establish regulations for the accountability of medical officers having charge of the hospital fund. And any officer who shall appropriate to his own use, or shall misapply, any portion of a hospital fund, or who shall make any false report of the number of soldiers sick in hospital, shall, on conviction, be punished as a court-martial or military commission may direct.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all non-commissioned officers and privates in the regular Army, serving under enlistments made prior to July 22, 1861, shall have the privilege of reënlisting for the term of three years in their respective organizations, until the 1st day of August next; and all such non-commissioned officers and privates so reënlisting shall be entitled to the bounties mentioned in the joint resolution of Congress approved January 13, 1864.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That section thirty-five of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall not be construed to apply to enlisted men employed as clerks and messengers in the military offices in Washington, and at the several geographical, division, and department headquarters.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That when the rank, pay, and emoluments of any officer are declared by law to be those of a specified military grade, he shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of that grade, and no more, any previous law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That there be added to the battalion of engineers one sergeant major and one quartermaster sergeant, who shall also be commissary sergeant, and each shall have the pay of a sergeant of engineers.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be attached to, and made a part of, the War Department, during the continuance of the present rebellion, a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Military Justice, to which shall be returned for revision the records and proceedings of all the courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the armies of the United States, and in which a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the head of said bureau, a Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, and one Assistant Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry. And the said Judge Advocate and his assistant shall receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of the courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the armies of the United States, and perform such other duties as have heretofore been performed by the Judge Advocate General of the armies of the United States.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall have power to appoint for said bureau one fourth class, one third class, one second class, and two first class clerks.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the Government shall furnish transportation and subsistence to discharged officers and soldiers from the place of their discharge to the place of their enrollment, or original muster into the service, they shall not be entitled to travel, pay, or commutation of subsistence.

Amend the fourth section of the amendment of the House by adding the words "without rations."

Strike out the sixth section of the amendment of the House.

Agree to the amendment of the House with the foregoing amendments.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out, in the fifth line of the ninth section, the word "colonel" and substitute the word "major," so as to make the Assistant Judge Advocate General a major in place of a colonel. His pay would be about three thousand six hundred dollars, and I suppose that is all that is important.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) If there is no objection, that amendment will be made. The Chair hears no objection. The proposed modification will be made; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs to the House amendment.

Mr. HOWE. Is this vote now upon the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the whole amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to ask a division of the question. I am not at all satisfied in my mind of the necessity of these eighth and ninth sections. I wish to have a separate vote in relation to that new system of military justice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be taken separately on the various propositions of amendment. The first proposition will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:
Strike out the first section of the amendment of the House, and insert as follows:

That on and after the 1st day of May, 1864, and during the continuance of the present rebellion, the pay per month of non-commissioned officers and privates in the regular Army and volunteer and drafted forces in the service of the United States shall be as follows, namely: sergeant majors, twenty-six dollars; quartermaster sergeants of cavalry and artillery, twenty-three dollars; of infantry, twenty dollars; first sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, twenty-four dollars; sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, twenty dollars; sergeants of ordnance, sappers and miners, and pontoniers, thirty-four dollars; corporals of ordnance, sappers and miners, and pontoniers, twenty dollars; privates, first class of the same corps, eighteen dollars; privates, second class of the same corps, sixteen dollars; corporals of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, eighteen dollars; chief buglers of cavalry, twenty-three dollars; buglers, sixteen dollars; farriers and blacksmiths of cavalry and artificers of artillery, eighteen dollars; privates of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, sixteen dollars; principal musicians of artillery and infantry, twenty-two dollars; musicians of artillery and infantry, and musicians of sappers and miners and pontoniers, sixteen dollars; hospital stewards of the first class, thirty-three dollars; hospital stewards of the second class, twenty-five dollars; hospital stewards of the third class, twenty-three dollars.

Mr. POWELL. Is it in order to amend that amendment now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is an amendment to an amendment. An amendment in the third degree is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say in regard to this amendment that it preserves the existing ratio between the privates and non-commissioned officers of the several arms of the service. The House amendment does not do so. Besides that this adds three dollars a month to the hospital stewards, which is a very small increase, but a very proper one.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether the amendments proposed by the committee do not increase the compensation over and above the rates provided by the amendment of the House of Representatives. I desire also to ascertain from him what is meant by privates of the first class and privates of the second class, and why the distinction of sixteen dollars and eighteen dollars a month.

Mr. WILSON. That is in the engineer corps. The amendment of the House of Representatives proposes to give all privates sixteen dollars a month. We have always paid the sergeants and privates in the engineer corps a larger sum than others. There are two classes of privates in the engineer corps, and this amendment of ours simply adds three dollars a month to each, preserving the same relation between them. The Committee on Military Affairs supposed that these differences between the several arms of service were founded on principle, and that they ought not now to be disturbed. The committee therefore propose simply to add three dollars a month to the pay of all privates. The first sergeant of engineers has thirty-four dollars a month. We have not changed that. We thought that was very good pay.

Mr. CONNESS. Permit me to ask what the increase proposed is; how much does it amount to? I do not mean in the aggregate; but what is the difference in favor of the compensation of the soldiers by this amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs over the amendment sent from the other House? If the chairman will state the difference succinctly, I shall be pleased to hear it.

Mr. WILSON. There is no difference between them except as to the engineer corps of the Army. The amendment of the House of Representatives put the engineer corps on the same footing with the infantry, artillery, and cavalry. In that corps we have always paid privates of the first class two dollars a month more than in any other branch of the service, because it is necessary to get men of experience and some peculiar culture adapted to that arm of the service.

Mr. CONNESS. How many of them are there?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot tell certainly how many. In the regular service there are less than seven hundred. In the volunteer service there are a few regiments, I think not more than three or four. I will say that in a bill which we reported here some weeks ago the ration was reduced to the old standard, and two dollars a month added to the pay of the privates and non-commissioned officers. That would carry the pay of privates up to fifteen dollars. This is an addition of one dollar over what was provided in that bill, making it sixteen dollars.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know how much the pay of the non-commissioned officers is increased by this proposition of the Military Committee, and what proportion that bears to the increase in the pay of the privates.

Mr. WILSON. About three dollars a month.

Mr. GRIMES. All around?

Mr. WILSON. About the same. All the sergeants and corporals are raised three dollars. The corporals now have the same pay as the privates. At the time we increased the pay of the privates from eleven dollars to thirteen dollars a month we did not increase the pay of the corporals; that was then thirteen dollars; so they are now on the same footing, and there has been great complaint of it from that hour to this. We therefore now put corporals at eighteen dollars a month. That is, we add five dollars to them and to privates we add three dollars, they having had two before. That makes five dollars added to the privates' pay from the commencement, so that the ratio between the corporals and the privates will be the same as it was at the commencement of the rebellion.

The amendment of the committee to the House amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee further propose to amend the House amendment by inserting several new sections after the second section of the House amendment. The first of these new sections will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That hereafter rations shall not be issued to soldiers sick in hospital, but commutation of rations shall be allowed and paid into the hospital fund, at the rate now established by law, for each soldier reported by the surgeon in charge as sick in hospital; and the receipt of the surgeon in charge shall be a sufficient voucher for the paymaster, or other disbursing officer, who may be charged with the payment of such commutation: Provided, That the hospital fund shall be devoted solely to the diet and maintenance of the sick and wounded soldiers in such hospital: And provided further, That the Surgeon General shall, with the approval of the Secretary of War, establish regulations for the accountability of medical officers having charge of the hospital fund. And any officer who shall appropriate to his own use, or shall misapply, any portion of a hospital fund, or who shall make any false report of the number of soldiers sick in hospital, shall, on conviction, be punished as a court-martial or military commission may direct.

Mr. HOWE. I believe I have never voted against a proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts touching military affairs. I do not remember that ever I did; but I must confess I am very sorry to hear this proposition. Yet I am not prepared to state the objections to it which I really believe exist. I do understand, in a general way, that this hospital fund has been so far in the conduct of the war a mere matter of plunder. Precisely how it is absorbed I am not prepared to state. This proposition, I believe, is to commute it, and to make the receipt of the surgeon in charge of a hospital a sufficient voucher on which the paymaster is to make his disbursements. I should suppose that the effect of the proposition would be to increase the hospital fund and to lessen the security for its proper appropriation. My understanding is that there is an appropriation, the most liberal appropriation ever made by any Government, to the medical department of the Army for the support, and quite equal to the support, of all our soldiers who require medical attention, and that this hospital fund has never furnished them any relief, and, in all human probability, never will. I have an indistinct recollection—some Senators will tell me how far I am right and how far I am wrong—that within a few months past a surgeon connected with the Army of the Potomac was tried before a court-martial for the misappropriation of what has been known as the hospital fund. The fact of the misappropriation was abundantly established, and yet the judgment of the court was a judgment of acquittal, because it was the usage of the Army, and had been so long the usage of the Army that, notwithstanding it was a violation of law, the surgeon ought not to be held guilty. I have read such a story, and I cannot tell now who the officer was or just where the trial took place; but my convictions are so very strong that this hospital fund has been a demoralizing agent, and one of the greatest demoralizing agents, found in the Army, beating whisky all hollow, not saying who did it—my convictions are so very strong on that point that I am unwilling to see any step taken toward nursing a hospital fund. If it were abolished altogether, if these commutations were stopped, and the soldier was turned over to the medical department to be supported while he is sick—and the appropriations for that purpose, as I have already said, I believe to be ample—I think it would be better for the morals of the Army.

Mr. COLLAMER. I presume, though I do not know it, that the Senator from Wisconsin has reference to the case of a surgeon of a New Hampshire regiment, Dr. Thayer. I am acquainted with that case, and I think the Senator from New Hampshire will bear me out as to the facts of it, which I am about to state. His regiment was stationed up the river, no very great distance from here, I believe, a year or more since, and the surgeon had on his hands some very sick men whom he wanted to get off the ground. They had fever, and he desired to get some boards that he might make a board floor to his hospital tent, and also make it secure against the wind blowing in. The quartermaster could not furnish him with the supplies necessary for this purpose. He then went and purchased the boards and made a floor and got his sick men off the ground and saved their lives. When he got through, he consulted with the brigade surgeon how he should manage to get his money for the boards and nails and other things used in doing that work. That officer said he did not know any way of doing it unless by putting them down as diet for the sick, as milk, chickens, &c. The doctor put in the amount as diet for the sick, and rendered his account in that way. A year afterwards his account was looked up, and somebody ascertained that there were boards charged as diet. Complaint was made of the surgeon, and a court-martial tried him. It was shown by the surgeon who directed him to do so, and by the medical inspector, that he had been told so to do, and he called half a dozen old surgeons in the Army, who testified that that was the way they always did it; that when it came to a case of absolute necessity they took the money out of the hospital fund in that manner. The court acquitted the surgeon; but lo and behold! the Secretary of War and those under him read over the record, and they at once disapproved of the finding of the court, and discharged the surgeon from the service. We have succeeded since, through the President, in replacing him. He is an honorable gentleman in every respect, above all possibility of equivocation about anything. The President was satisfied that the men's lives had been saved, and the account was all right and straight, and though it was not actually diet for the sick, it was that treatment of them which saved their lives.

Mr. HALE. I will state, as I have been appealed to in this matter, that after Dr. Thayer was dismissed I went with him to the President and stated the case. The President referred it to Judge Holt, and Judge Holt investigated it; and the evidence was that he was a man of the highest character, both professionally and socially, and Mr. Holt so found and regretted very much the necessity which had led to his dismissal from the service. There was, however, one point in the evidence which was not entirely clear, and that was that which the Senator from Vermont has mentioned, that his superior officer, the brigade surgeon, had recommended what was done or was cognizant of it. Judge Holt suspended his decision until that surgeon could be written to. I believe he was then in Boston harbor. He was written to and confirmed the statement of Dr. Thayer, and thereupon he was restored to the service and restored to his position in his regiment.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to ask whether this change as to the commutation of rations as proposed applies to all the temporary hospitals, all the new ones we have established, or only to the permanent hospitals? The value of the ration is different in different localities. In some places I can conceive that a commutation of this kind may be valuable and of great service and utility, while there may be other sections of the country, and especially in the temporary hospitals, where the commutation might not be desirable. If a change in this regard is had, I want to know whether it is going to be sweeping throughout the entire country, the value of the ration being different in different places.

Mr. WILSON. On the recommendation of the commissary and quartermaster departments, after a very careful investigation by the Committee on Military Affairs, it was decided that we should change the ration of the soldier from the one established in 1861 to the one existing at the opening of the war, and that it would save to the Government about two dollars a month. We found that the existing ration was too large, that a great deal was wasted, that the company fund came to nothing, and the benefit of it did not go to the soldier; but by changing the ration and paying to the soldier the two dollars a month he would have twenty-four dollars a year for himself. We thought this would be a benefit to the soldier.

Not wishing to do anything without careful examination of it, we sent this proposition to the Surgeon General. A letter came from him agreeing to the general change, but saying that in regard to the hospitals the present ration hardly furnished enough to get along for the benefit of the sick men; and therefore, in order not to reduce the ration of the soldiers in the hospitals, as it was hardly enough to get along with now, as they had to draw these rations and they were not fit to be used by sick men, but had to be sold back to the Government and the money taken and other articles purchased such as they needed, we have declared that instead of drawing the ration they may commute it at the rates established by law, and I believe it will be just to the country. There will be no more opportunity for a dishonest surgeon to do wrong then than now, because he can draw his rations; he is the judge; he can let them go back again, sell them to the Government and take what money he pleases, and invest that money for such articles as sick men need, and in many of our hospitals we use but very little of the rations. The form of drawing the rations is gone through, and they are sold back to the Government and the money taken at the established rates. This provision does not reduce the rations of the sick men, but commutes them at the existing price, and the money will be invested under the existing guards and restrictions, and we have, too, here a stronger restriction than has ever existed before. I think under this section the surgeons in the hospitals are under greater restrictions than they now are, and I believe it will be for the real benefit of the sick soldier, and we put it in for that purpose.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand it is not left optional with the surgeon in charge to commute these rations; but if this amendment prevails it is obligatory on him; he is obliged to do it.

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. HOWE. I rise for the purpose of saying two things: first, that I did not introduce the name of Dr. Thayer into this debate. I alluded to a case which I had seen stated in the papers; the name of the surgeon who was said to be court-martialed I did not remember, and do not now. Whether the case I read is the case which has been recited here by the Senator from Vermont, I am sure I have not the slightest idea. So I must not be understood as having made any attack on Dr. Thayer. He may be a very respectable man for aught I know. I know a great many medical gentlemen connected with the Army are respectable men. The facts asserted in the papers were that the medical officer was tried before a court-martial for a misappropriation of the hospital fund, and the fact of misappropriation was established by abundant proof, but the verdict was "not guilty," because such misappropriations were part of the common law, so to speak, of the Army. So much for the newspapers. I do not assert the fact to be so; but it tallied so exactly with information I had received from private sources of the usage in reference to this fund that it made an impression on my mind. Perhaps I have not thought of it in the Senate before today.

The Senator from Massachusetts tells us that they found they could save two dollars per month by changing the ration of the soldier from what it was made by the law of 1861 to what it had been prior to that law; that the officer at the head of the medical department did not agree to it because he had found that the ration awarded by the Government to the support of a well, active, laboring soldier was not equal to the sustenance of a sick man. I think the appropriation made to that department for the support of the sick amounts to about seven dollars per month. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] shakes his head, and that makes me think I am wrong, but still I think I am right. Including the deficiency, the sum appropriated to that department equals seven dollars per month to every one of the sick. That is my impression about it. That is independent of the ration; and yet the Surgeon General informs the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that it is necessary to have for a sick soldier, in addition to this appropriation, a larger sum than for a well soldier. I put it to the Senator if that is plausible, if that is reasonable, if that is right.

Mr. WILSON. The evidence is overwhelming, both from the quartermaster and commissary departments, that the old ration is abundant for the soldiers, and out of it they can lay up money, and where soldiers understand how to take care of themselves many companies in the regular service under the old ration laid up from $500 to $1,200 a year. In the volunteer service we profess to have a company fund too, but the men get very little of the benefit of it, and it is said that there are great abuses in regard to it, that it is often appropriated for presents to officers and other things. Believing that the old ration is amply sufficient for the men in the service in the field, we propose to change the present ration for the old one and pay the addition, which is about one dollar and eighty-seven cents a month, or say two dollars, in round numbers, into the pockets of the men directly; let them have the money as their own. This amendment does that.

We called on the Surgeon General in regard to it, and the Surgeon General stated in a letter to the committee that the ration as drawn and the commutation allowed by the existing law, with the other appropriations made by the Government for the support of men in hospitals, are none too large, and he has therefore suggested that we allow the present ration to stand for hospitals and commute it at present rates; and as that was more convenient to do and was thought to be the best, we decided not to change it.

Now, I will call the Senator's attention for a moment to the provisions of the section, which were intended to be very stringent and to increase the responsibilities of these officers beyond what they now are. There may have been some abuse, but I think generally our hospitals are admirably administered and honestly administered. This section provides:

Provided, That the hospital fund shall be devoted solely to the diet and maintenance of the sick and wounded soldiers in such hospital: And provided further, That the Surgeon General shall, with the approval of the Secretary of War, establish regulations for the accountability of medical officers having charge of the hospital fund. And any officer who shall appropriate to his own use, or shall misapply, any portion of a hospital fund, or who shall make any false report of the number of soldiers sick in hospital, shall, on conviction, be punished as a court-martial or military commission may direct.

It is intended to be stringent; and I tell the Senator from Wisconsin sincerely that I believe the passage of the bill with this amendment will be for the benefit of the soldier in the hospital as well as in the field, and it will be an additional restriction in the management of our hospitals.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator after all has not answered the question I put to him. My question was whether the assertion of the Surgeon General that, in addition to the appropriation made to the medical department for the support of the sick soldiers, it cost more to maintain them when sick than when well, that they demanded a larger ration or a larger sum of money, is not prima facie false. The Surgeon General asserts that a larger ration will be needed to support the soldier when he is sick and upon his back, at the very time when support is provided for out of another appropriation, which as I have already said is very much larger than was ever made by any Government before for medical purposes—at that time the Surgeon General says that he needs more, a larger ration, than when he is well. The question I wanted the chairman of the Military Committee to answer was whether that was not upon its face false, whether we had any right to believe such a statement and to legislate upon it. To me it appears so.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senate that the present ration is drawn, and if a man can use it it is used, but if not it is sold back to the Government, commuted at a certain rate. The bread, and meat, and potatoes that men live on when they are well, will not do to nourish sick men, and the articles that sick men need cost more in proportion than other articles do, and therefore a man who when he is well can live on his rations and not consume them all, cannot do so when he is sick. He cannot then use those rations, and they are commuted at the present legal rates, and the commutation money will not furnish him with all the articles he absolutely wants, and we have made a general appropriation for and some other articles for all the hospitals in addition to the commutation fund for the rations.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. There are two purposes attempted to be answered by this section. The first is the diminution of the ration of the soldier, (about two dollars a month was the estimate,) and instead of giving him the increased ration provided for by the act of 1861, we propose to give him that much in money, believing that the former ration was abundantly sufficient for him. The increase in the ration of the Army was made on the motion of Colonel Baker, of Oregon, and it has been found since that the old ration was sufficient and abundant for a well soldier in the Army. Instead of giving him the increased ration at an additional expense to the Government of about two dollars a month, we propose to give him two dollars a month as increased pay. That far there seems to be no possible objection to the section. But when soldiers are ordered into hospital, it is found that the ration of 1861 is not too much to support them, because the surgeon has to buy many articles which are not embraced in the former ration and which cost more; and we propose, instead of reducing the ration when the soldier is ordered into hospital, to give the surgeon the benefit of the increased ration to be used for the relief of the soldier, and to impose the most stringent restrictions as to the application of the funds. I can well imagine that it may cost more to support a sick soldier than a well soldier, for the articles necessary for his food cost often more. It seems to me there can be no possible objection to this. We decrease the ration to the well soldier about two dollars a month, and instead of issuing to him more than he can eat we give him money to that extent. To the sick soldier we allow the present ration and authorize the surgeon to buy for him whatever is necessary in his condition. That is the whole of it. These are the two propositions in this section.

The section was agreed to.

The next branch of the amendment was read, as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all non-commissioned officers and privates in the regular Army, serving under enlistments made prior to July 22, 1861, shall have the privilege of reenlisting for the term of three years in their respective organizations until the 1st day of August next; and all such non-commissioned officers and privates so reenlisting shall be entitled to the bounties mentioned in the joint resolution of Congress approved January 13, 1864.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to have that explained.

Mr. WILSON. Soldiers enlisted into the regular Army before the 22d day of July, 1861, were enlisted for five years, and had no bounty whatever. They have served nearly three years without any bounty, and they have not the privilege which the soldiers who enlisted afterwards have of reenlisting and receiving the increased bounty we gave to regulars and volunteers who had less than a year to serve. These old soldiers have served the country with great fidelity. The regular regiments have been very severely cut up in the various battles through which our armies have passed, and these men have never received a dollar's bounty, never can receive it, and have to serve out their five years, if they live that time. They see volunteers receiving a bounty on entering the service, and regulars receiving a bounty going in for three years, reenlisting and receiving as veterans $400. Those men who were enlisted before the 22d of July, 1861, for five years, are serving in the same companies with men who enlisted after the 22d of July, 1861, for three years, and received $100 bounty, and who on reenlisting receive $400 bounty. Five hundred dollars bounty is thus put into the pockets of the men with whom they are fighting the battles of the country, and they receive nothing, and no consideration at the hands of their Government, the Government of course holding them to their contract to serve five years. I simply propose that from the passage of this act to the 1st day of August these few old veteran soldiers who enlisted before the 22d of July, 1861, for five years without any bounty, shall have the privilege of reenlisting into the service of the United States for the term of three years, and receiving the bounty we paid by the act of last January, $400 to veterans; and I think the country owes that to these old soldiers.

The section was agreed to.

The next section of the amendment was read, as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That section thirty-five of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall not be construed to apply to enlisted men employed as clerks and messengers in the military offices in Washington, and at the several geographical, division, and department headquarters.

Mr. GRIMES. What does that mean?

Mr. WILSON. By a provision in the enrollment act of last year soldiers could not be detailed for special service to the rear. Some detailed soldiers are employed in the War Department, and some at the department headquarters, and we propose simply that these soldiers may receive the increased pay of forty cents a day. There cannot be many of them, not more than two or three hundred altogether.

The section was agreed to.

The next section of the amendment was read, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That when the rank, pay, and emoluments of any officer are declared by law to be those of a specified military grade, he shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of that grade, and no more, any previous law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

The section was agreed to.

The next section of the amendment was read, as follows:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That there be added to the battalion of engineers, one sergeant major and one quartermaster sergeant, who shall also be commissary sergeant, and each shall have the pay of a sergeant of engineers.

The section was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. The next three sections should go together as parts of the same system.

The Secretary read the next three sections of the amendment, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be attached to, and made a part of, the War Department, during the continuance of the present rebellion, a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Military Justice, to which shall be returned for revision the records and proceedings of all the courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the armies of the United States, and in which a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the head of said bureau, a Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, and one Assistant Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major of cavalry. And the said judge advocate and his assistant shall receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of the courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the armies of the United States, and perform such other duties as have heretofore been performed by the Judge Advocate General of the armies of the United States.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall have power to appoint (or said bureau one fourth class, one third class, one second class, and two first class clerks.

Mr. HALE. Of course what I say will have but little effect on the Senate, but I am decidedly opposed to that amendment and I hope it will not be adopted. It seems to me to be incongruous and absurd to appoint a judicial officer, and assign him judicial duties, and then give him the rank, pay, and emoluments of an officer in the field. Where is the propriety, or the expediency, or the wisdom, or the safety of such a rule? There is no analogy between them. The Judge Advocate General sits in his office; the duties he has to perform are judicial in their character. I have not a word to say against paying him everything that the committee think he ought to receive. It is not of that that I complain, but it is of what I think is an improper and vicious way of graduating the pay of civil officers. It is an evil that a good many have been striving to get rid of in the Army for a long series of years. It has been got rid of in the Navy after a long trial; in the naval service the allowances have been struck off and a fixed salary paid to the officers. An attempt has been made since I have been a member of the Senate, frequently to get rid of them in the Army. I remember that when Mr. Davis was chairman of the Military Committee in the Senate, a position which he held for a good many years, this matter was referred to him and he made a report—I do not remember whether it was written or verbal, but it was somewhat elaborate—in which he admitted the impolicy and impropriety of this mode of paying officers, but contended that it was impossible or next to impossible to make a fixed rule, owing to the inequalities of the service, that men in the field had to perform various kinds of service, some were ordered here and some there, and on account of the nature of the services they were called upon to perform it was necessary that there should be a sliding or graduating scale.

But when you come to appoint an officer who is to stay at home, sit in his room, perform judicial duty, weigh evidence, examine records, where is the propriety of graduating his pay by the pay of a brigadier general in the field? Is there any analogy between the duties that a general in the field is required to perform and a judge in his office? Then, it is proposed to give his assistants the pay of a major of cavalry. Where is the propriety of paying associate justices—for that is what they are—side-justices of this military tribunal, as majors of cavalry? If the Committee on Military Affairs insist on this, I hope they will go further and provide that these officers shall sit in uniform, that they shall have their chapeaus, &c., on, whenever they sit. As the judges of the Supreme Court wear black gowns, let these majors of cavalry, when they come in to sit as judicial officers, come dressed in their regimentals. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The objection of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire seems to be that we are appointing a civil officer, a judge, and giving him the rank and pay of a military officer, a brigadier general of cavalry. It seems to me that the Senator utterly mistakes the nature of the office which we confer by this bill. The office of judge advocate is as much a military office as a major of any battalion in your Army, and always has been so regarded. In every court-martial that is called in your Army, certain officers of a certain grade are detailed, and a judge advocate is detailed who is also connected with the Army for the purpose of prosecuting the claim in behalf of the Government. He is in effect the prosecuting attorney for the Government; and it is a military office in the organization of our Army from the beginning to the present moment, and in the organization of every army in Europe, and always has been regarded as a military office. The duties to be discharged by this Bureau of Military Justice, in a certain sense, are judicial; and yet what is the investigation, what is the reading, what are the studies necessary to enable him to discharge his duties? Simply the study of military law, the rules and regulations for the Army, the laws of war as applied to military trials. It is essentially a military office; and the moment your Army is dispensed with every single judge advocate, whether of a minor military court or of the Bureau of Military Justice, necessarily falls. It has no connection with the administration of civil justice as applied to your minor courts. It is a military office, and a high office of great importance, and it seems to me it should be invested with rank and pay and emoluments commensurate with the importance of the office.

Here we propose to make your Judge Advocate General a brigadier general, to give him the pay and emoluments of a brigadier general, and it is surely not too much when he has to revise and report to the President and Secretary of War upon every single military trial in all your armies throughout the whole extent of the country, embracing in one year, as the records show, more than fourteen thousand cases. It is not too much rank, it is not too much pay, as it seems to me, to give him; and he is, to all intents and purposes, a military officer, as I believe, as much as any colonel in your Army, or general, or major general, or commander of a corps. It is essentially a military office and nothing else, and requires the revision of military decisions, an investigation and understanding of military laws. Another amendment, proposed by the Senator from Iowa, I believe, is to reduce the rank of the Assistant Judge Advocate General to that of a major, with the pay and emoluments of a major of cavalry instead of a colonel. I see no kind of propriety in that. I think these offices require the very highest talent that we can command, and I think the pay of a major is not commensurate with the importance of the duties intended to be performed. If I am misinformed, and if that amendment has already been passed upon, I have nothing to say in reference to it; but I do think that the report of the Committee on Military Affairs should be adopted, and that your Judge Advocate General should be a brigadier, with all the emoluments pertaining to that office, and the Assistant Judge Advocate General should be a colonel.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree entirely with the honorable Senator from Indiana. When the amendment now proposed to this bill was before us as an independent and separate bill the Senate will remember the position the honorable Senator from New Hampshire took. I think the honorable Senator is more attached to his idea in the premises than he has need to be. As far as this day is concerned, I will say to the honorable Senator he ought to be satisfied with his triumph. He has succeeded in passing three somewhat unreasonable bills, in which I with others were compelled to unite with him by the force of his eloquence; and now, having ridden roughshod over one standing committee of the Senate, that of Pensions, he proposes to run down the Committee on Military Affairs. I submit that this is too much even for the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

I agree entirely with the honorable Senator from Indiana that this is essentially a military office; and, if the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me for the expression, I think it is unworthy of him that he should detain the Senate and expend himself and waste himself upon the mere form of pay and compensation to be given to this officer. I am very free to say that I know there is no Senator more impressive to generous emotions than the honorable Senator himself; certainly there is none more in the habit of endeavoring, and perhaps succeeding, in impressing others than he is; but I am prepared to say that on this subject I look through the proposition to the man. I know that that is not the logic of the case; but I look through this proposition to the man, Jo. Holt. I call him by that name because it is by that appellation that he is popularly and familiarly known and loved through this country. I think that the services of that man at a time antecedent to the beginning of this war never should be forgotten and never will be forgotten. I would not detain a bill before this body that comprehended, not simply compensation to him, but giving him all the dignities that might surround any position to which he is properly nominated and appointed. I hope my honorable friend, guided by his ordinary generosity, will make no further opposition to this proposition. I am very glad indeed that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has proposed to append it to this bill, in order to get rid of the difficulty in which it has been tied up by the differences heretofore between the House of Representatives and the Senate; and I hope we shall pass it here without any further ceremony.

Mr. HALE. Dr. Sangrado, when he was killing all the city he was practicing medicine upon, being advised to abandon his system, said he would do it if he had not written a book upon it; [laughter;] and so on this subject, so far as one humble individual is concerned, I am committed against this mode of compensating officers. I never wrote a book about it, but I have made several silly speeches on the subject. [Laughter.]

Suppose that we wanted to do honor to the Supreme Court. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HANLAX] wants to give them a retiring pension. Suppose he should add to his retiring bill that each of the judges, when he retired, should be entitled to wear a chapeau with a feather in it, or that he should be entitled to the rank of a brigadier or major general. Suppose you put Mr. Holt upon the bench with all the merit that so justly belongs to him, with all the gratitude due to him which the Senator from California so well expresses, and which I certainly share in. Suppose that you give him just as much salary as you think he ought to have. If the pay of a brigadier general is $5,000, give him $5,000; set him up on the bench, and when a case is brought before him, and just before he commences, let the crier of the court make proclamation, and the marshal come in and put a chapeau on his head and the plume in his hand. How much would our veneration and regard for him be increased by that system?

I think the honorable Senator from Indiana (and he will pardon me for doubting his accuracy in that respect) is mistaken when he says that a judge advocate has always been an attaché of the Army. I rely upon the testimony of a gentleman who certainly knows as much about this matter as anybody, and who spoke upon it the other day, the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GAMES.] When this subject was under discussion a few days since the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] in reply to a similar assertion made by me, after a few generous compliments to me which I did not deserve, put in a proviso that I was sometimes liable like the rest of us to be mistaken in point of law and fact, and that I was so in that instance; whereupon the Senator from Iowa rose, and if he did not satisfy the Senator from Massachusetts he did everybody else, that it was the Senator from Massachusetts that was mistaken in the law and fact when he undertook to correct me. In addition to that, I remember a very famous military trial that took place in this country, one that is as notorious as any that ever took place since we had a national existence—I refer to the trial of General Hull for the surrender of Detroit. Do honorable Senators remember who was the judge advocate there? It was Martin Van Buren. What military rank did he hold? None at all. It was a judicial office with judicial duties to perform, and he was a lawyer of eminent standing and he was selected.

But, sir, I do not expect to satisfy the Senate. The Senate have voted this proposition down once by a very decided vote. I remember the Hon. Mr. Benton when he was here argued upon the omnibus bill that he could not see into the philosophy of the Senate, after they had voted down individual bills, putting them all together in an omnibus bill, and then going for the whole of them. If this measure was unwise as an individual measure it is unwise as an amendment to this bill. Let the Senate appoint the judge advocate and pay him, appoint him assistants and pay them, and not have the fuss and feathers of military parade brought into your judicial proceedings.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. It is very true that civilians have sometimes been detailed or appointed to act as judge advocates of courts-martial, but they have always owed their appointment either to the commanding general or to the Secretary of War, and for the time being they were military officers acting under military authority, and their civil position was entirely sunk in the military appointment.

Mr. WILSON. The difference between this bill and the one we had up the other day, which was voted down as the Senator from New Hampshire says, is in this respect: that bill provided for the establishment of a permanent bureau; this bill provides for its continuance only during the present rebellion. That bill provided for two assistants with the rank of colonels. We provide here for only one, whose rank, on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, has been reduced to that of a major. I can assure the Senator from New Hampshire that the object was to make this bureau as small an expense to the Government as possible in order to get along. I assure him further that the Secretary of War is exceedingly anxious that this should pass. He believes that the public service and the good of the Army really demand it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to inquire what will be the amount of compensation which will be paid under this bill to the principal officer, the Judge Advocate General.

Mr. WILSON. I have not figured it out. It is very easy for any one to take the book and do so. I suppose the pay of a brigadier general must be about five thousand dollars. The pay of a major, as we have it now, is thirty-five or thirty-six hundred dollars.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will again ask what objection the gentleman has to fixing a direct and certain sum that we all know as the compensation of this officer?

Mr. WILSON. It is desirable to put this department on the same footing as all the others. The heads of the quartermaster's, commissary's, and ordnance departments are all brigadier generals, and receive the pay and emoluments of brigadier generals.

Mr. HALE. Is the question pending an amendment to an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HALE. Then it is not in order to move to amend it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. GRIMES and Mr. JOHNSON. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs to the amendment of the House of Representatives, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. The question is whether we shall adopt the three sections marked eight, nine, and ten in the printed amendments before us, all on the same subject. The tenth section was not read, but relates to the same subject as the others, the establishment of a Bureau of Military Justice.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, and Richardson—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Fessenden, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Willey, and Wright—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert as section eleven the following:

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the Government shall furnish transportation and subsistence to discharged officers and soldiers from the place of their discharge to the place of their enrollment or original muster-in to the service, they shall not be entitled to travel pay or commutation of subsistence.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I wish to move to reconsider the vote by which section nine of the committee's amendment authorizing the appointment of an Assistant Judge Advocate General, with the rank and pay of a colonel, was amended by striking out "colonel" and inserting "major." The amendment passed without my observing it, and I should like to have another vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be necessary, in the opinion of the Chair, to reconsider the vote adopting that section as an amendment, before it can be reached.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state that that alteration was made by unanimous consent when it would not have been in order if any one objected, and it having been made under those circumstances, if the Senator from Indiana desires to have a vote upon it, it seems to me it would be no more than fair that by unanimous consent a vote be taken in the Senate. At the time the motion was made it was out of order, it being an amendment in the third degree. I think the Chair stated—I do not remember whether the present occupant was in the chair at the time—that it would not be in order to move to strike out the word "colonel" and insert "major," but by unanimous consent it might be done; and I think it was done in that way.

Mr. FOOT. It was as stated by the Senator from Illinois. I happened to be temporarily in the chair, and upon a suggestion to make that modification the Chair remarked that if no objection should be made the modification would be made as proposed—I think the proposition was suggested by the Senator from Iowa—and no objection being interposed, the modification was made by unanimous consent. The attention of but a few Senators, I presume, was directed to the matter at the time.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I was not present when the vote was taken, or I certainly should have objected to it.

Mr. FOOT. No vote was taken. It was done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question again, and let it be tried in the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and the question now will be on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to amend section nine of the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, by striking out the word "colonel" and inserting "major."

Mr. GRIMES. Upon personal reasons I dislike exceedingly to make this motion or to vote for it, because I suppose I am situated as a great many other gentlemen are. They have friends who are aspirants for this place and who feel quite confident they are going to secure it. That is the case with me. But I am compelled to vote for the proposition to reduce the office of the Assistant Judge Advocate General from the rank of colonel to that of major for the reasons that I have stated before. In the first place, as I understand it, and I think I am tolerably accurate in it, the pay of a major doing bureau duty here in Washington is about $3,600 a year, which is $600 more than is paid to your Assistant Attorney General, to the Solicitor of your War Department, and to the chiefs of your most important bureaus. I do not know any reason why we should pay this assistant this large sum over and above what we are paying to those other bureau officers and to your Assistant Attorney General, who I understand is a very respectable lawyer and a man of good reputation, and to the Solicitor of your War Department, who I apprehend is quite as able. I mean the salary fixed by law for him. I am told he does not draw any salary, because he is a very rich man and a very patriotic man; but $3,000 is the salary that has been established by law for his office; and I know of no reason why we should establish a new rule in this case other than that which was established in that case.

I should like to hear some of the Senators who propose that we shall make this assistant a colonel of cavalry in the place of a major, tell me how much that pay is. Nearly five thousand dollars; and the pay of a brigadier general doing duty in Washington to-day is more than six thousand dollars. As Senators will observe, the Army regulations fix the commutation of quarters, firewood, &c., at different points throughout the United States. The regulations authorize the Secretary of War to change those commutations from time to time. Last autumn he saw fit to change the commutation so far as the department of Washington was concerned, and to declare by an order which he sent to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury that all the commutation for quarters of men who were established here in Washington should be doubled. That brought up the mere commutation of a brigadier general's quarters and firewood to $1,360; the commutation of a lieutenant colonel or a major of quarters and firewood was brought up to $1,134; and the commutation of quarters and firewood alone of a captain or chaplain in this city under that order amounts to $868 62.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. By what authority did the Secretary of War increase these commutations?

Mr. GRIMES. He had authority to do it. The law of Congress passed in the latter part of the last century declares that all rules and regulations of war established by the War Department not inconsistent with the laws of the United States shall have the force and effect of law. The law authorizes the Secretary of War to establish these rules and regulations; and these rules and regulations expressly declare that the Secretary of War may change them.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator if the commutations to which he has reference have not been fixed by law, and had not been fixed by law before they were increased by the Secretary of War?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir. They were fixed by the Army rules and regulations, not by law. The commutations of quarters and fuel and lights, &c., were fixed by regulation, and the Secretary of War had the right to change them, and he changed them so far as the department of Washington was concerned. Now, what is the fact? It costs a great deal more for an officer of the Army to live in New Orleans than it does to live in Washington. There is no increase in the commutations of quarters, to the officers who are so unfortunate as to be located in New Orleans. It costs quite as much for an officer to-day in Nashville, Louisville, or St. Louis as it does in Washington to-day. There is no increase there. The result is, all the officers there are clamorous to the members of Congress, with whom they are acquainted, asking for the same advantages to be yielded to them that are granted to the officers who are stationed here in Washington.

This accounts for the way in which Senators will discover that the pay of a major on duty in this city amounts to $3,600. It is by the increase of the commutation of fuel and room rent over and above the commutation that is allowed by the Articles of War. At present a major is allowed $1,134. One half of that is an excess over what he is allowed by the Rules and Articles of War. All over $3,000 is the increase of pay by that means to the major.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to strike out the word "colonel" and insert the word "major."

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to have the yeas and nays upon that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to be distinctly informed what will be the difference in pay whether this assistant is a colonel of cavalry or a major of cavalry. I want to know it in round numbers distinctly, so that I may know the difference.

Mr. COLLAMER. You mean the commutation and pay in Washington?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Three thousand seven hundred dollars in the one case and $5,000 in the other.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. For my part my mind would be better satisfied to say at once we give Mr. Holt $5,000 a year, and we give his assistant $3,500. Then we should know just what we give them.

Mr. POMEROY. This amendment only has reference to the assistant.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand this amendment is to reduce the assistant from the rank and pay of a colonel of cavalry to a major of cavalry; but I do not know what effect that has on the salary.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Iowa told you just now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from Iowa when he was on the floor to state that the pay of a major of cavalry located in Washington is over three thousand six hundred dollars. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is that a fact?

Mr. WILSON. It is thirty-five or thirty-six hundred dollars, and that of a colonel is from four thousand to four thousand two hundred dollars under the present ruling in regard to fuel and quarters. That will probably be changed this summer.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to take the sense of the Senate on a proposition to pay the Judge Advocate General $5,000 a year, and his assistant $3,500.

Mr. HALE. You cannot know how much this pay is. The most definite answer that could be made to the Senator from Wisconsin is that one of these salaries is a large sum and the other one is a little larger. [Laughter.] That is about the whole of it. You cannot get at it exactly, and nobody here can tell what it is.

Mr. CONNESS. There seems to be much difficulty in the Senate in regard to the difference between the compensation of a brigadier general and a colonel, and that of a colonel and major, as if we were not paying several brigadier generals now, and colonels and majors, as if it were not simply an every-day business, as if it were not the greatest part of our business. These close inquiries in regard to it, which are proper enough in their way, only occur because of the objections to this bill. I do not know why gentlemen should desire to be so accurate in regard to the salary or compensation of one single officer of a certain grade when we are paying so many hundreds of the same grade constantly.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me that the Senate ought always to have a distinct comprehension of what they are doing. This thing of creating salaries under phrases the meaning of which is not understood by any Senator at the time they are voting upon them, seems to me to be a very objectionable mode. This Judge Advocate General is an officer located in this city. His duties are simple and uniform. His office is here. His expenditures do not fluctuate in consequence of casualties or differences of condition. I suppose the same is true in relation to his assistant. It seems to me that the plain and simple way to compensate both the Judge Advocate General and his assistant would be to give them a definite sum as an annual salary. This mode of producing a large increase of the salary of either of these officers by saying he shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general or of a colonel seems to me to be all wrong. If a definite sum could be offered to every officer under the Government as his compensation, be he military or civil, it seems to me it would be the proper rule. The country then would know what was done; the Senate would know what it had done when it adopted the proposition; and there would not be as many different opinions in relation to the amount of compensation as there were differences of opinion expressed by different Senators. I accord to the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin. I believe both these officers ought to receive a definite precise sum for their pay and salary, and what would be sufficient ought to be voted them, without giving them anything under the phrase, "the rank, pay, and emoluments of major, or colonel, or general," the amount of which was not understood by the Senate at the time they were voting it.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I expect to vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs; but I am sure no Senator will suspect me of being governed by the motive suggested by the Senator from Iowa. It is not probable that any Democrat will be appointed to fill this place, and therefore I shall not have much to do with the appointment of the man. But the Senate has already decided that the Judge Advocate General shall be a military officer, and that he shall have the grade of a brigadier. Now, according to military usage, what ought to be the grade of his assistant? Ought it not to be in an officer next to him in rank—a colonel? It seems to me that is very plain; and whether we pay him $500 more or $500 less is not a matter of much consequence in view of the very great importance of this court.

But, sir, I did not intend to speak about that. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to this question: are the decisions of this court to be final? Is it to be a court, or is it merely to be a set of clerks to make recommendations to the Secretary of War, who is to decide arbitrarily and without much reference to law? If it is to be a court, I am not afraid of its decisions, because public opinion will hold that court to the law and the facts of each case; but if it is merely to make recommendations to the Secretary of War and he is to decide as a mere administrative officer, without regard to that responsibility that a court feels to public opinion and to the law, this court will not be of much importance. I suggest to the chairman whether he cannot, by the use of some proper words, give more force to the decisions of this court as a court.

Mr. WILSON. I think we have gone as far as we can.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think I can understand very well why the pay of a general in the field, or a colonel in the field, who is compelled to be mounted, to have at least one and often two horses for his actual service, so far as rations and forage for his horses are concerned, should be an uncertain quantity, because in different sections of the country, at different seasons and different times, there is a different price upon all this forage which may be necessary to sustain and to keep his horse. I can see why you should give a colonel of cavalry, or an officer who is actually mounted, his pay proper, and allow him also so many rations and so much forage for his horses, and allow the Secretary of War, or the regulations, to establish what the value of the ration shall be in different parts of the country. It may be higher in Washington than it is in Wisconsin, where forage is cheap, comparatively.

But, sir, for my life I cannot understand, when your Judge Advocate General is not required to be mounted in the field or to have horses or forage or any rations, and your Assistant Judge Advocate is to be located at Washington like an Assistant Attorney General, without horses, without forage, without rations, and when he travels from here is paid his mileage for traveling, why it is necessary to govern their pay by this unknown quantity, represented by x, y, and z in mathematics. What is the necessity for it? Here is this Judge Advocate General to be established in an office in Washington. Why can we not say we will pay him say $5,000 a year? If $5,000 is not enough say $6,000. No man has a higher estimate than I have of the person who now exercises that office, Hon. Joseph Holt. No one can have a higher estimate of a man than I have of him, and I am willing to give him a liberal compensation. So too in relation to the Assistant Judge Advocate General. If $3,000 is not enough say $3,500; but do not let us be governed by an unknown quantity in fixing salaries where it is not necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 16, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by GEORGE W. HOSMER, D. D., of Buffalo, New York.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. DAWES presented the credentials of A. A. C. Rogers, claiming a seat in the House of Representatives as a Representative from the State of Arkansas; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of States for bills on leave, for reference only, and not to be brought back by motion to reconsider.

MARQUETTE AND ONTONAGON RAILROAD.

Mr. KERNAN introduced a bill extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company of the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WARRANT OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. ELIOT introduced a bill to authorize assimilated rank to be given to the warrant officers of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill in addition to acts in relation to the registers of vessels; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AFRICANS IN THE MILITIA.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, introduced a bill for the enrollment, organization, and service of certain persons of African descent in the militia of the several States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask to have the bill read. The bill was read.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object to the second reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot object. The rule requires that bills introduced under this order of business shall be referred without debate to the proper committees.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have moved to reject the bill, and I understand the Chair to decide that such motion is out of order, and that the bill must be referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decides. The bill must be referred.

The bill received its first and second readings, and was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

PHOEBE WILSON.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Phoebe Wilson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The SPEAKER. The call of States having been finished, the morning hour is devoted to the consideration of resolutions from the various States, commencing with the State of Maine.

PURPOSES OF THE WAR.

Mr. DAWSON introduced the following preamble and resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Whereas, It was solemnly declared by this House, on the 22d day of July, 1861, speaking in the name of the people of the United States and in the face of the world, that the present civil war was waged for no purpose of conquest or oppression, but solely to restore the Union, with all the rights of the people and of the States unimpaired; and whereas a civil war like the present is the most grievous of all national calamities, producing, as it does, bloodshed, spoliation, and anarchy, public debt, official corruption, and general demoralization; and whereas the American Government cannot rightfully wage war upon any portion of its people except for the sole purpose of vindicating the Constitution and laws, and restoring both to their just supremacy; and whereas a restoration of peace is essential to the perpetuation of a system of republican Government, it is now eminently befiting a Christian and homogeneous people in the triumph of our arms and in the exultation of victory, to tender the olive branch as a substitute for the sword: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be required to make known by public proclamation, or otherwise, to all the country, that whenever any State now in insurrection shall submit herself to the authority of the Federal Government, as defined by the Constitution, all hostilities against her shall cease, and such State shall be protected from all external interference with her local laws and institutions; and her people shall be guaranteed in the full enjoyment of all those rights which the Federal Constitution gave them; and in the exercise of a sound and patriotic discretion, he shall proclaim a general amnesty to all those who, by false counsels, have been induced to engage in the work of rebellion.

Mr. A. MYERS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DAWSON. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL. If the previous question is not seconded, will it be in order to move to amend the resolution?

The SPEAKER. If no debate arises it would be; if debate arises, it would go over under the rule.

Mr. A. MYERS. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. ANCONA. I renew it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Who made the motion to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ANCONA.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If that side desire to lay the resolution on the table, of course we have no objection to it.

Mr. COX. No, sir, we do not desire to lay the resolution on the table, but we want a record by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Frank Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hutchins, Jencks, Jullian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—76.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James B. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kernan, Knapp, Lazarus, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Pruyn, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Voorhees, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—53.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

During the call of the roll, Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, stated that his colleague, Mr. L. MYERS, was detained at home by illness in his family.

Mr. MOORHEAD stated that his colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, was detained at home by the death of his mother.

Mr. SWEAT stated that he was paired off with his colleague, Mr. BLAINE.

ROBERT B. TAYLOR.

Mr. KELLEY offered a resolution requesting the Secretary of War to transmit to the House a copy of the record, and review thereof, of the trial before a military commission of Robert B. Taylor, a citizen of Tennessee, on a charge of murder.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the resolution, but I would like to say that resolutions from the House of Representatives are not answered by the War Department. Three months ago I offered a resolution, which passed the House, calling for information from that Department, which has not yet been furnished. I think that until the War Department learns to treat the resolutions of this House with some respect, we ought not to call upon it for information. I do not object to the resolution, but I wish it to go to the country that our calls upon the Department are not attended to.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

VETERAN RESERVE CORPS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, offered a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Secretary of War to inform the House whether any order of the Department had been issued whereby invalids are being recruited into the invalid or veteran reserve corps and carried to the quota of any district, as sound men are recruited, at the discretion of the recruit or otherwise; and if so, by the authority of what law such order has been made.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMODORE WILKES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, offered a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, directing the Secretary of the Navy to communicate to this House the proceedings of the court-martial that tried Commodore Charles Wilkes, including all the evidence.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLOCK AND STATUARY OF OLD HALL.

Mr. SPALDING offered a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, directing the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to inquire into the propriety of removing from the old Hall of the House of Representatives, and of placing in this Hall, the clock and statuary therewith connected, consisting of the Muse of History and the Car of Time; and to report to the House with all reasonable dispatch.

GREEN CLAY GOODLOE.

Mr. SMITH introduced a joint resolution, which was read a first and second time, resolving that nothing in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1865," shall be so construed as to prevent the reappointment of Green Clay Goodloe by the President of the United States to a cadetship at such Military Academy.

Mr. SMITH. I desire unanimous consent to make a statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH. The young man to whom this joint resolution refers volunteered, when about fifteen years of age, in the service of the United States. He remained in the service nearly two years. In September last he was appointed by the President a cadet at West Point. Having been so long in the service, he was unfortunate enough not to pass the examinations in January, but the board unanimously recommended him for reappointment. It seems, however, that the Military Academy bill, passed at this session, prevents such reappointment. It is to remedy that that the passage of this joint resolution is asked. The young man is very intelligent, and has made a good soldier; but there is no chance of his reappointment unless this joint resolution be passed.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same; namely:

An act (H. R. No. 185) to establish a postal money order system; and

An act (H. R. No. 370) to appoint certain officers of the Navy.

IMPRISONMENT OF WILLIAM YOCUM.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following preamble and resolution, and on their adoption demanded the previous question:

Whereas it is represented that William Yocum, a loyal citizen of the United States, was charged with having committed some military offense at Cairo, in the State of Illinois, for which he was arrested and sent on to this city for trial, and his case being heard by a military court he was adjudged to be imprisoned for a term of years; after which the facts of the case being presented to Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, he has addressed to Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, a written recommendation to discharge said Yocum from imprisonment; but the said Stanton disregarded the President's recommendation, and ordered the said Yocum to be taken to the penitentiary of New York at Albany, and to be imprisoned in it; and whereas it is represented that the President of the United States afterwards made and executed a full and unconditional pardon of the said Yocum of and from the judgments and sentence aforesaid, and said pardon was placed in the hands of the said Stanton to obtain his order for the discharge of said Yocum from imprisonment under said judgment and sentence, and that he refused to respect and obey said pardon, and in defiance of it continued said Yocum in imprisonment in the penitentiary aforesaid:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary do inquire into and report all the facts connected with the alleged trial, imprisonment, and pardon of William Yocum, of Illinois, and his detention in prison after his pardon; and said committee is empowered to send for persons and papers.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that as the amendment has been adopted the preamble be withdrawn.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have no feeling on the subject except to obtain the facts. The preamble simply recites the facts as they have come to me, and gentlemen will notice that no authority is given to it except that it has been so represented. I will withdraw the preamble, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF ILLINOIS MEMBER.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to introduce a joint resolution, and have it put on its passage. I will state that it meets the approbation of the entire Illinois delegation.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That in the election of Representatives to Congress from the State of Illinois, the additional Representative allowed to said State, by an act entitled "An act fixing the number of the House of Representatives from and after the 3d day of March, 1863," approved March 4, 1862, may be elected by the State at large until the said State shall be redistricted by the Legislature thereof for the election of the fourteen members to which said State is now entitled by law.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. DAWES. I think that should go to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. With the consent of the House I will state that the last Congress passed a resolution providing for the election to this Congress of the additional member to which the State of Illinois is entitled in consequence of the fact that the Legislature would not meet until after that election. I will state that the same reason now exists in relation to the next election.

Mr. DAWES. If that be the state of the case now I will withdraw all opposition to the passage of the joint resolution without reference.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN WASHINGTON STREETS.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN submitted the following resolution, and on its passage demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into and report what legislation is necessary, and what further public officers are needed to prevent or abate the obstructions of the streets of the city of Washington, as prescribed by the original plan; and particularly by what authority of law Eighth street west is obstructed so as to prevent sight of the Smithsonian grounds and proper ventilation of that street; also, by what authority of law, north B street is used for building purposes; also by what law or regulation the streets leading toward the public Mall are trenchoned upon by any structures whatever, preventing an uninterrupted view of the grounds and that ventilation which is a necessity to the health of the city; and also, whether the rental of the public reservation between Tenth and Twelfth streets west, near north B street, accrues to the Government or the corporation of Washington.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATCHEZ CONTRABANDS.

Mr. GRINNELL submitted the following resolution, and on its adoption called for the previous question:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire as to the occasion of the military order of Brigadier General J. M. Tuttle for the government of the city of Natchez, Mississippi, which forbids any contraband remaining in the city of Natchez who is not employed by some responsible white person; and also forbids any contraband from hiring any house in said city; whereby hundreds of children have been taken from the schools and many of the families of soldiers have been delivered to slavery.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. GRINNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Mr. ELDRIDGE introduced the following resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report to this House by what warrant or authority the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property, and for the prevention of fraud, in insurrectionary districts within the United States," was approved on the 12th of March, 1863, and whether said act is in force.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

ELECTORAL VOTES FOR PRESIDENT.

Mr. COX introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be directed to take into consideration the propriety of reporting to this House a bill providing for the decision of any question which may arise as to the regularity and authenticity of the returns of the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States, or the rights of the persons to give the votes, or the manner in which they ought to be counted; and that such law provide for the jurisdiction, as well as the course of proceedings, in case of real controversy.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after Wednesday next the House will meet at eleven o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the resolution is in order.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia. I desire to say that I would be glad to meet an hour earlier if we had to adjourn an hour earlier.

Mr. ASHLEY. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution then goes over, under the rule.

LAND TITLES IN UTAH.

Mr. KINNEY introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill at the earliest possible day, authorizing the owners and claimants of lots in the cities, towns, and villages of the Territory of Utah to acquire a title to the same, paying at the nearest land office the sum of $1 25 per acre, and that the bill be so framed as to allow the county judge of such county to enter the land embraced upon the recorded plats of said cities, towns, and villages, as trustee in trust for the respective owners and claimants.

The SPEAKER. The States having been called through for resolutions, the next business in order is to take up resolutions calling upon the Departments for information, and which have been laid over under the rule.

DISLOYAL CLERK IN THE TREASURY.

Under the regular order of business, the House took up for consideration a resolution introduced by Mr. FARNSWORTH on the 4th of May, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to inform this House whether there is employed in the Treasury Department, as a clerk or assistant register, a person named Garnett, and whether said Garnett formerly held a commission in the rebel army and was for a time a prisoner in the Old Capitol prison, and who recommended the appointment of said Garnett in the Treasury Department.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from Illinois who introduced that resolution is not present, and I suggest that it be passed over.

Mr. THAYER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Perhaps there is no objection to the passage of the resolution, but its passage is entirely unnecessary. There was such a person in the Department, but upon a proper presentation of the facts he was removed. This man, as I understand, is from Virginia. There has always, since the rebellion opened, been a disposition in the Treasury Department, and probably in the other Departments, to find employment for refugees from the rebellious States who were supposed to be loyal. A great many such persons have been appointed to clerkships. It has been a matter of charity to appoint them; and the men have been recommended, honestly recommended very likely, but they have turned out to be, in some cases, complicated with the rebellion. I believe in every case where that fact has been known such persons have been removed. This happened to be an instance of that kind; but when the facts of the case became known to the Secretary the man was removed.

Mr. THAYER. After the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts I withdraw my objection to passing over the resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY. I would like to have this resolution pass. I would like to know how these men get into the Treasury Department; and I would like to see the names of the members of this House who recommend them.

I have been satisfied that for the past three years there has been a systematic effort of persons, traitors to this Government, to foist upon the Government some of the worst rebels in the land. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. WADSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF MILITARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. YEAMAN. I move that next Saturday, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I object.

Mr. YEAMAN. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of assigning Saturday next, after the morning hour, for the business of the Military Committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the motion by also assigning Friday next for the business of the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that that must be an independent motion.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and the motion was not agreed to, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. McINDOE asked and obtained consent to have taken from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 154, to provide for the better organization of the quartermaster's department; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior recommending appropriations to fulfill treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEYS IN DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior recommending an appropriation for the Indian surveys in the Territory of Dakota; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS asked unanimous consent to go to the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 5, granting public lands to the People's Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific coast by the northern route.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up; the question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WILSON. Does that bill come up in its regular order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] moved to go to the Speaker's table and take up the bill, and the Chair heard no objection.

Mr. WILSON. I did not hear the Chair ask for any objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did ask whether there was any objection, and the Chair heard none.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "three years" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is an amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] to strike out in the eleventh section the words "and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "and shall transport the troops and property of the United States free of charge."

Mr. STEVENS. In all the bills of this kind lately passed by Congress there is no such provision.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there are only one or two exceptions to the rule of this provision. The provision is not contained, it is true, in the act for the construction of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. But all of the railroad bills passed for Iowa, Illinois, and the other northwestern States, without a single exception, contain this provision. There seems to be no reason for deviating from that principle in this bill.

Mr. STEVENS. In the bill for the Central Union Pacific Railroad Company, all such services are to be paid for by the Government. I hope this amendment will not be insisted on. No money is asked from the Government, as in the case of the Central road; nothing but lands.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 55, and yeas 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, William G. Brown, Chandler, Dawes, Dawson, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Elliot, English, Fenton, Finck, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Harding, Herrick, Higby, Holman, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Philip Johnson, Orlando Kellogg, Law, Lazear, Long, Mallory, McIndoe, Morrison, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Alexander H. Rice, Ross, Scofield, Spalding, Strouse, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Wilson, and Fernando Wood—55.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Eldridge, Ganson, Garfield, Griswold, Benjamin G. Harris, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Longyear, Marcy, McBride, McClurg, Daniel Morris, James K. Morris, Noble, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Shannon, Sloan, Stevens, Stiles, Stuart, Sweat, Upson, Wilder, Windom, and Yeaman—47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move, on page 13, line two, to amend the bill by striking out the word "two" and inserting the word "one." This will shorten the time to one year in which to subscribe this preliminary $2,000,000. I think that time is long enough.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SLOAN. In lines nineteen and twenty, on page 2, I move to strike out the words "forty-fourth" and insert in lieu thereof "forty-fifth;" so as to make the clause read:

Thence on a line, north of the forty-fifth degree of latitude, to a point on the western line of the State of Minnesota, by the most eligible route, having reference to a connection with the railroad system of that State.

That I think will give latitude enough.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to amend in the eighth section and eighth line by striking out the word "third" and inserting the word "first;" so as to make the clause read:

That each and every grant, right, and privilege herein are so made and given to, and accepted by, said People's Pacific Railroad Company upon and subject to the following conditions, namely: that the said company shall commence the work on said road within one year from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete not less than fifty miles per year after the first year, and shall construct, furnish, equip, and complete the whole road by the 4th day of July, A. D. 1876.

That will give this company two years in which to construct the first fifty miles of the road, and insures the construction of the road by requiring them to construct at least fifty miles a year until its completion. In my judgment, no better disposition could be made of the lands along the proposed line than this. A northern Pacific railroad will undoubtedly be built, and I hope if the grant proposed in the bill is made it will accomplish that important object.

If this road is not built within our own territory, it will be built within the British possessions. There are already settlements in the lower and western portion of British Columbia, which are rapidly increasing in population and commercial importance, and they are largely interested in opening up a communication with the seaboard. The English never neglect their own interests. If this bill will be the means of constructing a road on our own soil, south of the British possessions, it is certainly a measure which every gentleman in the House ought to vote for. By the amendment which I propose, the company will be compelled to build fifty miles of the road each year after the first year, or their grant will be forfeited.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I ask my colleague to modify his amendment so as to make the limit after two years instead of after one. About all a railroad can do the first year is to organize.

Mr. SLOAN. My colleague is aware that this company has been organized for more than a year; and it is said that men who have abundant means are now ready to subscribe the stock and to engage in the work. It will be seen that my amendment gives two years to build the first fifty miles of the road. The language is, each year after the first year.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will say after the second year, I will vote for his amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the amendment of my colleague by striking out "first" and inserting "second."

Mr. SWEAT. I hope that amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SLOAN. That would give the company three years to build the first fifty miles of the road.

Mr. SWEAT. Not at all.

Mr. SLOAN. My amendment is within one year after the first year, which would give two years, and the gentleman's amendment would give three.

Mr. SWEAT. What I wish to provide for is that the company shall commence the work within one year from the passage of this act; and that after that time they shall complete not less than fifty miles of the road each year. My colleague must be aware that it will require some time for books to be opened, the stock subscribed for, and then for the engineers to locate the exact line of the road. I need not inform him or any other gentleman that the preliminary work for carrying such a scheme as this successfully into execution must be immense. I do not think the time suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] is too long, and I hope the amendment to the amendment will be adopted.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment, 30 voted in the affirmative, 24 in the negative—no quorum.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SWEAT, and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 40.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was then adopted.

The SPEAKER. The amendments having been disposed of, the question recurs on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WILSON. This bill proposes to grant fifty million acres of the public lands to the People's Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created by the Legislature of the State of Maine. Now, sir, this proposes something which has never been done by Congress, I believe, up to this time. Heretofore the grants of land in aid of the construction of railroads have been either to States or to corporations organized by act of Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. I see the gentleman is not very well versed in these matters. The charter of the Union Pacific railroad involved precisely the same principles as this one.

Mr. WILSON. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken in that. If he will examine the act in reference to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, he will find that the organization of the company was provided for in the different sections of the act.

Mr. STEVENS. The Union Pacific Railroad Company was organized by the Government to make a road through the Territories. In the States that authority had been given by charters granted under State laws of California and Kansas. The Union Pacific Railroad Company is not authorized to make a foot of road through any State of the Union.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that. The Union Pacific Railroad Company has a corporate existence within the Territories where it is to exercise its powers, and its organization and its powers were provided for in the act. But it is not so in this case, and therefore I desire to know something about the People's Pacific Railroad Company, what its powers are, and what the extent of its existence. We want to know something about the powers conferred by the Legislature of Maine upon a company to which it is now proposed to grant fifty million acres of the public lands. I think we ought to have some information upon these points, and I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will afford us that information in that respect. I certainly think we ought not to pass the bill without it, and I doubt whether we should pass it with that information.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to record my vote against the passage of such a bill. I understand that one railroad to the Pacific is already provided for by the laws of Congress, and it will probably require all our energies and resources to carry that into effect.

We are attempting now, as I understand it, to invest a private corporation from the State of Maine with fifty million acres of the public lands to carry through another railroad project tending toward the Pacific. For what good end? And at what time is it that we undertake to make this heavy donation? Why, sir, I read in the papers to-day that our national indebtedness is $1,700,000,000, and that indebtedness is hourly increasing. And in view of this startling fact we are called upon to give away our whole public domain and to rely solely upon taxing the people of the different States for the interest and principal of this enormous debt. You are to throw away all our governmental resources, and then rely upon burdening the people with taxes to pay this great national indebtedness.

I protest against it. I think such legislation as this will not be countenanced by the people, no matter what party they belong to. Sir, I have done.

Mr. SWEAT. I had occasion, Mr. Speaker, to make some remarks upon this subject two or three weeks ago, and I will say in the outset that I will occupy the attention of the House but a few moments now. I wish simply to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] who has just taken his seat. He objects to giving away so much of our public domain. I admit that the amount which is taken under this bill is large—some forty million acres—but let me ask that gentleman and all gentlemen what that land is worth unless it is improved? And how will you improve it unless you open avenues to it? Why, these public lands of ours, let me say to the gentleman from Ohio, he knows very well are now opened to settlement at a mere nominal price, and what are they worth? He asks, who can justify himself in giving a vote in favor of this bill, appropriating so large a number of acres of the public lands looking to a project like this?

I do not like to make any invidious comparisons between this road and the central road, but let me ask these gentlemen how they can justify themselves for giving to the Union Pacific road $100,000,000 of the bonds of the Government, and also a large land grant? And a proposition is now pending before the House asking for an additional subsidy, and my judgment is that that additional subsidy will be given to the Union Central Pacific railroad, not only in bonds but in additional lands, if they require it.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go at length into a comparison of the value to the country of these two roads. I undertook to prove the other day that this northern route is the great route pointed out by nature, connecting the great water lines of the continent. It is shorter, more easily built, of more importance to the country, and of more international importance, than any other route. The Union Pacific Railroad Company comes here asking Congress to give them additional aid; but this bill simply asks for a grant of land. The bill is so carefully worded that not a single acre of these lands can be appropriated by the company till they shall have completed, and put in running order, this road by sections of twenty-five miles each. If gentlemen have studied this matter, and see the importance of it, and are willing to go for it in any other shape, let them say so. If they object on the ground that this company was chartered originally by the State of Maine let them say so, and we shall know where to find them and how to meet them. This charter was granted in 1860, out of deference to objections made as to the power of Congress by just such gentlemen as the member from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] and others. The charter granted by the Maine Legislature I hold in my hand. It is drawn with great care and precision, regarding the rights of the States through which this road may pass. Some of the best and most responsible citizens of Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Michigan, Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota, and other States, are on the list of corporators and of commissioners. And although I do not care about having this grant made upon the charter given by the State of Maine, excepting that it might facilitate operations, still, having that view of the matter, I think it would be for the interests of the country to have it passed in aid of that charter. And why? Because, under that charter given by the State of Maine, the commissioners have met and organized. They know what is to be done. Their books will be ready for subscription as soon as this bill shall pass Congress; and they will be ready to put their surveyors on the work within sixty days.

I felt bound to reply to the gentleman from Ohio on these two grounds. I hope the time has long since gone by when there is to be any sectional prejudice, any prejudice between one State and another.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. SWEAT. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say, first, that I believe thoroughly in the policy of aiding the construction of railroads by grants of public lands; but my observation has taught me the necessity of providing against a great latitude in the acquisition of the privileges proposed by bills like this. The two points to which I call the attention of the gentleman from Maine are these: first, whether this great grant will not practically inure much more to the benefit of the British provinces north of the United States than to the benefit of the United States themselves. The second point is whether there ought not to be a provision which, on my motion, was incorporated into a resolution amendatory of an act granting lands to certain railroads, which operates, without legislation, a return of the lands granted and not earned by construction, at any period when the provision with reference to construction is not complied with.

These are the two points that trouble me with reference to this bill; and I hope the bill will be modified so as to meet these points.

Mr. SWEAT. With reference to the last suggestion made by the gentleman from Iowa, if I understand him, I should have no objection to that being incorporated in the bill. I have simply to say, in response to his first suggestion, that if I believed it would benefit the people of the British colonies as well as the people of the Northwest that would not change my mind in regard to the propriety of the passage of this bill. And I say to the gentleman that when he takes into consideration the territory of British Columbia as well as our own territory, he will find that a road built on the forty-seventh parallel of latitude is in fact a central route, and if we can make the people in British Columbia tributary to our own road I see no objection to it.

But, sir, as I said the other day, this matter has been considered by the British Government and by British capitalists, and they will, it is believed, build a road through the British possessions to Puget sound if this road is abandoned. It is well known that on the northern side of Lake Superior and through the British possessions the grades are heavier and the work more difficult of construction; and for the purpose of having a road opened up which will answer their purposes of communication these British capitalists are willing to invest their money in building a road through our territory as far south as the forty-seventh degree of latitude. Our territory extends to the forty-ninth degree, and if assistance of that description can be obtained from British capitalists, is that an objection to the scheme?

The matter of raising money sufficient to construct a work of such gigantic proportions is one of serious consideration. Where are the means to be raised? Even for the construction of the central road, in order to raise the money required upon United States bonds, you have got to go across the water for it; and why? Because money is cheaper there. Now, then, if upon this northern road money can be procured from English capitalists, as I believe it can be to a very large amount, is not that a very important advantage? Upon the central road two mortgages are already provided for: one to the Government and one to the road; and hence it will be impossible to secure private subscriptions based upon the security of the road itself. Now, the State of Maine has no interest in this matter of any description whatever aside or different from what the State of Ohio ought to have.

Mr. SPALDING. I beg to say that I have no sectional feeling about the matter in connection with the State of Maine. I am troubled, and very much in doubt, whether we will have land enough left to fill this grant after taking up what was granted a few evenings ago. If the gentleman can tell me how much land we have to spare, I could better ascertain to what extent my objections to this bill would go.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate have agreed to the amendment of the House to the resolution of the Senate (No. 21) to provide for the printing of official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States.

Also, that the Senate request the return of the bill of the Senate (No. 244) for the relief of Daniel Fitzgerald and Jonathan Ball.

By unanimous consent the Clerk was directed to return the said bill agreeably to the request of the Senate.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. SWEAT. It is very certain that we can get no more land than there is to spare, and no more than there is in alternate sections within twenty miles back on each side of the road.

Now, sir, I am very glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio state that he has no prejudice against the State of Maine. I repeat that the State of Maine has no peculiar interest in this project. Her Legislature was applied to by the company for an act of incorporation, simply because they happened to be in session in a later month in that year when the charter was granted than the Legislature of any other State. If any section of this country could have an interest in opposition to this road it would be the northern Atlantic States. I well recollect when the admission of Texas was under consideration a very distinguished Senator from New Hampshire raised as an argument in favor of her admission that the equilibrium between the inland States and Territories and the seaboard States of this country should be kept up. And that was the argument in favor of the admission of Texas. But we believe that that antagonism of the sea-coast to the interior is being abandoned in the light of the superior wisdom of the present day. If there was any antagonism Maine would naturally feel it. Maine has sent her sons to Iowa and Wisconsin, and those sons from both of those States are doing good service in the armies of the country to-day. While the population of Maine for the last ten years has increased only seven per cent., that of Iowa has increased two hundred and fifty-one, and that of Minnesota two thousand seven hundred and sixty per cent. In the same time that of Indiana thirty-six, Illinois one hundred, and Wisconsin one hundred and fifty-four per cent. I have no feeling of envy against those States, and as an eastern man coming from a State upon the eastern frontier, I am happy to say I rejoice in the fertility of your soil, in the superabundance of your granaries, and in the increase of your population. "Westward the course of empire takes its way."

I yield to it as a fixed fact, and as an eastern man am not jealous of the West because it is so. I rejoice in the fact that those food-producing States of the great Northwest are represented upon both sides of this House so ably as they are in this Congress. I congratulate them on their success in having such Representatives on this floor, and I only ask that they shall not be prejudiced against the State of Maine upon the frontier which has depopulated her own territory by sending men to the West, and be prejudiced simply by the fact that a bill was passed by her Legislature permitting or authorizing certain men in her own State, in connection with all New England and other States, to be the medium through which the Government might act for the purpose of giving aid to the building of this road. All I ask is that gentlemen upon that side of the House and upon this shall understand the importance of this bill, and then if they see fit to oppose it I have not another word to say. Your interest in it certainly ought to be as great as mine.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I see by the provisions of this bill that the road starts near Lake Superior. In the first place, I would like to know what interest the State of Maine has in a road that starts from the Lake Superior region and crossing to the Pacific more than any other State has.

Mr. SWEAT. It is simply the interest which any people, or any State, or any member of this House who understands the question ought to have. They believe this is the shortest, the cheapest, and the most important road to be built across this continent.

Mr. MORRILL. I confess I am one of those who do not understand this question, and therefore I am seeking information. I do not understand why Congress is to be called upon here to authorize an incorporated company of Maine to build a railroad to the Pacific.

Mr. SWEAT. Was that question raised when New York incorporated a company to build the Panama road? Was it asked when New York incorporated a company to build a road in Texas? The State of Maine simply incorporated a company, consisting of men from your own State, from New Hampshire, from Massachusetts, from the middle and western States, to act as incorporators; it also appoints a board of commissioners embracing all those various States; and now do you pretend to say, as a lawyer, that Congress has not the same power to grant aid to a company incorporated by a State as it has to charter its own immediate Federal agents? This doctrine of chartering your own immediate agents for building railroads and works of internal improvement crossing through States and Territories is a doctrine which was objected to in years gone by, but fortunately in 1862, when the central railroad was chartered, that doctrine was overlooked, and they gave a charter to a company for that purpose. But there is no reason why Congress may not grant aid to a company chartered by a State which would not apply with at least equal force to giving a charter directly to Federal agents.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that, so far as my observation has gone, these corporations which have been chartered by State Legislatures for similar purposes have passed into other hands, and have generally proved to be swindling concerns. I do not mean to say that such is the case with this.

I see that this line of railroad, for the greater part of the distance, is to go north of the forty-fifth degree of latitude; and I observe that by the argument of the gentleman he expects British capitalists to build the road. Now, what I want to know of the gentleman from Maine is whether it will not be a British road whether built by British capital or American?

Mr. SWEAT. I will say to the gentleman from Vermont that it is pretty certain unless we do build a road across our own territory, they will have a road of their own, which will be essentially a British road.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I wish to say, as representing a western State that is mentioned in this bill, that we care little by what State the charter was given to this company. One thing is very certain, that either a railroad is to be built to the Pacific by a northern route over American soil or over British soil. If it is built over American soil it is necessarily for all hostile purposes an American road and within our control. If built on British soil then it comes in collision with our interests on the Pacific; and I insist that whenever a practical proposition is submitted to Congress by which it can aid in the construction of a road to the Pacific that is to be over our national territory, within our own power, it ought to do so.

So far as the mere question of donating lands is concerned, I will say that as a general principle I have been entirely opposed to railroad grants. I think that they have rarely been of benefit either to the State that has received the grant or to the company that has constructed the road. But there are exceptions to that general rule. The rule would have applied to various grants made at this session. The exception is applicable to this very road by which a great national object is to be attained.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say a few words in regard to the gentleman's position. If this road was built it would be an American road in time of war, provided we have a sufficient force to protect it. If it is built over our soil and the British have sufficient force to seize it, then it will be a British road to all intents and purposes.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I will inform the gentleman that the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, over whose soil this road is to pass, have furnished very good evidence during this war that they are able to maintain and hold in behalf of the United States any road that may pass through their territory; and I think the fear of the gentleman in that respect is entirely unfounded.

Mr. SWEAT. The gentleman from Vermont says that inasmuch as we expect with some reason aid from British capitalists to build this road it must be considered a British road. I reply to the gentleman that he might as well, with as much propriety, say that the Illinois Central is an English road, because, as I understand, it has been built to a very large extent by the aid of British capital. And if you take all these northwestern States, where there have been eleven thousand miles of railroad built within the last ten years, it will be found that a large amount of capital invested in these roads has come directly or indirectly from English sources.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman mistakes my point. I suppose the road will be more for the accommodation of the British provinces than for our accommodation. I do not object to British capital being employed in the Illinois Central road, but I do object to Congress granting aid for the benefit of the British provinces.

Mr. SWEAT. Does the gentleman from Vermont bear in mind the degree of latitude to which our territory extends? We go up to the forty-ninth degree of latitude. Let him look at the statistics, and he is a great statistician, I believe, and he will find that British Columbia is not only an immense territory, but that numerous and populous settlements are growing up in it. One argument about this is that we shall have coming in as tributaries to this road the interests of English colonists. I have no feeling of prejudice against those colonists. If they see fit to give us their trade, so much the better.

What interest, I am asked, has Maine in this road, starting from Lake Superior? That terminus is mentioned simply as connecting the western waters, so as to make the shortest line existing through to Puget sound.

There was one other fact which I alluded to the other day, and which I think is an argument in favor of the practicability of this measure, and that is that we should have the interest of the great North American railway giving us their aid to construct a road through to Puget sound over our territory. But, sir, I do not propose to detain the House at this time by elaborating that argument; for upon this as well as upon the other various points arising in the consideration of this subject I have already spoken at length on another occasion, and I now yield the floor to the chairman of the committee to move the previous question.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. STEVENS. I will yield for this once, but not again.

Mr. SLOAN. I think the grant is not sufficiently guarded in case this company fails to comply with the conditions and provisions of this bill. I desire, therefore, to amend it in one or two particulars for the purpose of providing more thoroughly for such a contingency. I move in section nine, line five, before the word "conditions" to insert the words "provisions or." I move further in the sixth line to strike out "one year" and insert "six months," and to strike out "at any time hereafter, the United States, by its Congress, may do any and all acts and things which may be necessary to insure a speedy completion of said road," and insert in lieu thereof "the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States and the grant hereby made shall be null and void." The section would then read:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the United States make the several conditional grants herein, and that the said People's Pacific Railroad Company accept the same, upon the further condition that if the said company make any breach of the provisions or conditions hereof, and allow the same to continue for upward of six months, then in such case the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States and the grant hereby made shall be null and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DONNELLY. I should not encroach upon the time of the House upon this subject did it not seem to me apparent that there is to some extent a lack of information upon some of the principal questions involved in this measure. I shall, therefore, as briefly as possible, set forth a few of the more important facts to which I think the attention of the House should be called, and strive to answer some of the objections which have been made in the course of this discussion.

It is known to most of the members of this House that it was originally contemplated that there should be constructed from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean three great lines of railroad: one, the northern route, running through the region of country through which it is proposed this road shall pass; another, a central road, to connect with the railroads prolonged from the neighborhood of St. Louis; and still another, a southern route. At length the Government, in its anxiety to bring about the construction of at least one of these roads, determined to concentrate its assistance upon the central route, and for that purpose, in addition to a very large grant of lands, gave to the road a most liberal loan of United States Government bonds.

At that time Congress seems to have entirely forgotten, while it was thus liberal to the central route, that it ought not to completely ignore the claims of the other two roads; and that while it gave both lands and bonds to the first, it should at least have given lands to the others. It seems to me, then, Mr. Speaker, entirely proper, just, and right that some such action as that contemplated by this bill should now be taken. It will at least repair the omissions of the past.

Some question has been raised as to the character of the country traversed by this route.

If this grant is made, a region of country reaching from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean, with an average width of a thousand miles, will be opened up to settlement which otherwise would probably remain an unbroken wilderness for very many years to come.

It is not to be expected that any large agricultural population can ever be brought to settle in a country having no ready outlet to the markets of the world. This railroad is a necessity to that great region of country.

But it may be said that that outlet will be found in the Central Pacific road. I answer that it is impracticable for this important and immense region of country ever to be drained by a series of transverse railroads reaching to a central line nearly a thousand miles distant. In fact this country never can be opened unless Congress, following the course it has always heretofore pursued, shall make a liberal grant of public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad running from the great valley to the sea, through its midst, and which will develop its immense resources. The land itself, which this bill proposes to give away, is worth nothing to the Government in its present condition, and will remain of no value unless communication is opened between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific ocean.

Let it not be said that such a road is an impossibility.

Thirty-five years ago there were but three miles of railroad in the United States; to-day there are thirty-three thousand eight hundred and sixty miles built, and sixteen thousand miles in process of construction, making a total of nearly fifty thousand miles.

The bill under consideration asks for a land grant to assist the building of a road seventeen hundred miles in length, from the western termination of the great lakes to the Pacific ocean.

If thirty-five years of the past have given us fifty thousand miles of railway, is it an extravagant assumption that one half or one third of that period in the future will give us seventeen hundred miles?

The vast extent of the country to be drained by this road will compel its construction.

I say, then, that it is impossible that this great region of country, nearly a thousand miles in width, and reaching from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean, can remain totally dependent upon a railroad line a thousand miles distant from its northernmost boundary. Why, Mr. Speaker, imagine such a state of things. Suppose that from the latitude of Washington to the borders of Maine no system of railroads led from the Atlantic to the Mississippi valley, and that the entire traffic of that great region had to go one thousand miles out of its way to strike a railroad going westward, and rise again a thousand miles after it had reached the longitude of its destination.

You cannot deny to this great region of country an outlet, and it is simply a question whether you will make it a complete and perfect outlet as you now can, or trust, with the gradual development of the country, to add link after link to a crude, imperfect, and gradually developed system as State after State is built up in that great interior region.

Some allusion has been made to Canada. It has been said that Canada may be benefited by the building of this road. Be it so. It is impossible for Canada to prosper without the territory lying south of it prospering also. It is impossible by a national boundary line to check the growth and advance of commerce; you cannot have upon one side of a national boundary line abundant prosperity and success and upon the other desolation and poverty. If Canada is to grow all that northern Pacific region must grow with it. The development of Canada has, to a certain extent, in the eastern portion of the continent, kept even pace hitherto with the development of our own country. Away, then, with that narrow and illiberal spirit which would deny to our own people the means of advancement and growth, lest the very overflows and drippings of our prosperity should enrich some neighboring population. Let us be content to go forward in our career of unexampled development regardless of the advantages which may be reflected upon other nations. Let us not imitate Diogenes, who drove away the rats from his tub, lest it should seem that even he nourished parasites.

Another question occurs. It may be said—and there is upon the minds of many such an impression—that this whole interior region of country is a vast wilderness, unfitted for settlement and incapable of supporting any considerable body of population. This is very far, indeed, from being the case. I have never been more surprised by the perusal of any work than I was in reading the report of Captain John Mullan in reference to the construction of a wagon road from Fort Benton westward. It appears from that official document that on the line over which this road would pass the road would scarcely ever be beyond the reach of timber, and rarely, if ever, beyond the reach of fertile and cultivable soil.

I state to this House a fact, referred to more than once upon this floor, that there is a wide difference between the country over which the Central Pacific road will pass and the region which this road would develop. It is the popular belief that all that interior region is a sterile, treeless wilderness; and yet there is at one point on the route of this road a solid forest one hundred and twenty miles in width; there are vast ranges of fine agricultural soil; there is room for the development of immense States, and the day will come when those States will be represented upon this floor, and, gazing back to the events of the present hour, men will wonder that the right of this great region to a railroad outlet ever was denied by intelligent members of this House.

I say to you that if a continuous line of fertile, agricultural States ever reaches across this continent it must be through the country over which this road will pass. This region of country, and the British possessions north of it, are the only unsettled regions in the temperate zone of our continent fitted to sustain large agricultural populations. The flood of emigration must move in that direction or be permanently checked.

In confirmation of this view, I would ask the attention of the House to the following summary of the character of that country from the report of Lieutenant Mullan:

"The amount of agricultural land along the general line of the road may be safely estimated at one thousand square miles, or six hundred and forty thousand acres.

"The largest single body is found in the Walla-Walla valley, where its rich soil, freedom from early frosts, and its mild climate, constitute it a great agricultural center. Corn, oats, barley, spring and autumn wheat, tobacco, and every variety of vegetable, are here grown in great abundance; wheat, thirty bushels to the acre; barley and oats, forty bushels; and corn from sixty to eighty bushels; and potatoes from three to six hundred bushels to the acre. The grape and the peach will be found to grow well here, and when the country is settled the oak will take its place among the chief forest growth.

"The mines furnish a ready market for all that is raised, cash payments for which are made in gold.

"Fruit-growing is attracting attention, and thus far promises well. Erection of grist-mills keeps pace with the growing demands of the country.

"Another favorite agricultural tract is the Dry creek; its valley is already studded with beautiful farms; so also the Touchet, where there is still room for the industrious emigrant.

"At the mouth of the Palouse is a small tract of good land, enough for one small farm, and which, as trade and travel increase, must become an important point.

"Several tracts of good land are found along the Palouse, but the absence of timber is an impediment not easily supplied.

"Small tracts are found along the Cow creek and along the road to Aspen grove, and many in the direction of the long line of lagoons found along the road.

"An excellent body of good land is found along Lake William and along several of the smaller lakes and creeks to its mouth.

"Several small bodies are found along both banks of the Spokane; near the Foot Hill several farms are already under cultivation. Along the Upper Spokane are also small bodies. At the Cœur d'Alene mission is a body of five or six square miles of most beautiful land; several hundred acres are here under cultivation by the mission and the Indians. Oats, barley, wheat, peas, and potatoes are raised in rich abundance.

"One of the largest bodies of good land is in the St. Joseph's and Cœur d'Alene valleys; and if these valleys are once drained, a body of forty thousand acres of the finest soil in the world will be reclaimed, soil six and eight feet deep, and as black as a coal.

"On the right bank of the Cœur d'Alene, opposite the mission, is a mile square of beautiful soil. Four-mile prairie has a good body of land; also Ten-mile prairie.

"From this point to the Bitter Root ferry I fear the frosts and other mountain characteristics will preclude any farms from being opened.

"At the mouth of St. Regis Bogria, however, several tracts of land are found, and which, if cultivated, will come into requisition for mail stations and supplying travelers and emigrants. Seven-mile prairie along the Bitter Root river offers a good site for small farms; also Brown's prairie, Nemoté prairie, Skiotay creek, where the wild timothy grows abundantly, and many large and beautiful tracts along the right bank of the main Bitter Root. Frenchtown, in Hell's Gate route, already contains from ten to fifteen small farms, and there is room for many more. The small creeks in Hell's Gate route offer many choice sites for farms; a dozen, at least, are here now under cultivation. Wheat, potatoes, oats, and barley, and all vegetables are raised. Corn is not matured, but it is raised for roasting-ears. The St. Mary's valley to the south, and the Jocko and Flathead valleys to the north, are large and favorite farming sections.

"Among the small creeks, tributaries to the Hell's Gate, four and five miles from Big Blackfoot, at Clark's camp, at Beaver Dam butte, and along some of the smaller water-runs, good soil is found. The upper portion of the valley of Flint creek may be found suited to agriculture.

"From Flint creek to the American fork are many beautiful localities where farms may be opened. A large and beautiful one is already opened by a Mr. Dempsey, where he grows oats and wheat luxuriantly. The American fork has some beautiful bodies of land along it. The Deer Lodge is a large and well-located valley, and contains from fifty to one hundred and fifty square miles, where crops have already been grown. Along the Little Blackfoot and its smaller tributaries are found patches of good soil. From this point to the Big Prickly Pear creek, the altitude and wet condition of the soil may prove impediments to successful or economical culture.

"Crossing the divide we get into a new climate and change of soil; along the Big Prickly Pear will be found several small and choice localities for farms; and if the mines on the eastern slope prove successful I look forward with much hope to see all these creeks settled and fine farms developed under the hand of the Rocky mountain farmer. All the small creeks from the Big Prickly Pear to the Bird-Tail Rock have smaller bodies of good soil, and if the mines prove a ready market will be had for all that they can raise.

"To the south of the Bird-Tail Rock, about three to five miles, in a wild and broken region, through which a wagon road can be laid to shorten our line from Sun river to the Dearborn, is one of the largest and richest bodies of land that I have seen east of the mountains, and where timber from the mountains and rock at hand will supply all the requisites of the first settlers. Situated as it is midway between Fort Benton and the Prickly Pear gold mines, it is worthy an examination by those who propose to settle in the country. It was on my last trip that I was struck with the richness of the soil and the extent of agricultural land here found. It is a favorite resort for game, and, sheltered as it is by high rocky walls, forms a choice site for farms.

"The next good tract is along the Sun river, where a stiff clay soil is already cultivated to advantage. The Blackfoot agency has a farm of from thirty to forty acres under cultivation, and raises wheat and vegetables. Its valley is from fifty to one hundred and fifty feet below the general level of the Missouri plains, and is thus sheltered from the colder winds that sweep across them at spring seasons. Some patches of good soil are found along the Missouri, above Fort Benton, but their culture has never been tested.

"There are enough statistics of growth, from actual cultivation along the line, to show that the many areas herein referred to will grow abundant crops, and all of which will come under tillage as soon as a market presents itself.

"In addition to this, the experience of all persons traveling through this region has been that from the Columbia to the Missouri rivers, finer grasses have never anywhere been seen; the number and condition of the stock that feed upon the wild grasses alone, show both their abundance and nutrition. Wild hay can be and is cut from thousands of acres. Horses and horned stock by thousands, and sheep by hundreds, all bespeak the wealth that is wrapped up in the native grasses of the North Pacific region, and I confidently look forward to seeing the wealth of these beautiful mountain valleys yet consist in the thousands of fleecy flocks to be here sheared; and, if the streams of the Rocky mountains are themselves caught and harnessed to the spindles and looms of wool manufacturing to be there erected, that the annual shipments of wool to a St. Louis market will constitute a trade replete with wealth and magnitude."

How wide the difference between this favored region and the country farther south through which the Central Pacific road must pass! A vast, treeless waste, of sage bushes, alkaline plains, and sand-hills, it will be impossible ever to establish through it any continuous line of settlements. The way-traffic of such a road can be of little or no value; it must create depots of fuel at stated intervals, and must carry forward with it everything it consumes.

Listen to the description which Lieutenant G. K. Warren gives, in his report (page 8) of an exploration of the country between the Missouri and Platte rivers and the Rocky mountains, of the sand-hill country, a description which applies to a very large portion of the route of the Central Pacific railroad:

"The sand hills present their most characteristic appearance just north of Calamus river, spread out in every direction to the extreme verge of the horizon. The sand is nearly white, a lightish yellow, and is about three fourths covered with coarse grass and other plants, their roots penetrating so deep that it is almost impossible to pull them out. The sand is formed into limited basins, over the rims of which you are constantly passing, up one side and down the other, the feet of the animals frequently sinking so as to make the progress excessively laborious.

"The scenery is exceedingly solitary, silent, and desolate, and depressing to one's spirits. Antelope, and at times buffalo, are numerous. The character of the country is well calculated to cover a stealthy march or retreat; and if one keeps as much as possible to the hollows, he may even fire his rifle within a quarter of a mile of an enemy's camp without being aware of each other's presence, and I consider it hopeless to attempt to capture any who had sought refuge in the sand hills. Farther west, I am told, these hills increase in height and are impassable for horses."

And yet, while to a railroad running over such a country as this not only lands but bonds of the United States are given, the country described by Captain Mullan is denied even the poor boon of a land grant, and all manner of captious objections are raised against the one great measure necessary for its development.

But there is still another fact, a very significant fact, connected with this measure.

We have upon our continent a chain of mighty lakes which have been not inaptly termed a great river, because from the point where they arise in the plains of Minnesota to the point where the St. Lawrence falls into the Atlantic they are, as it were, but the expansions of one mighty river. The head of Lake Superior, at its western extremity, is almost half way across this continent. What, then, is more natural than to connect this mighty system of water communication with a railroad system stretching away from its western extremity by the most direct route to the Pacific ocean? You cannot ignore the great fact that at the head of Lake Superior you are several hundred miles further westward, several hundred miles further into the heart of this continent, several hundred miles nearer the Pacific than you are upon the shores of Lake Michigan. Shall we, then, ignore this mighty fact; shall we, in aiming at the Pacific, seek land travel in a parallel line for several hundred miles side by side with Lake Superior? Shall the movement of commerce over this mighty water system be forever checked and arrested at the mouth of Lake Superior, and be forever interdicted from moving over its broad waters? Certainly not; no local jealousy, no temporary superiority in numbers in this House of rival interests, can permanently negative the importance of that great fact. Commerce is not to be tied to the heels of local prejudice; but will seek out its own natural pathways with an instinct that never errs. These lakes, with a railroad prolongation from their western extremity, will yet form the great causeway of commerce across our continent.

Hence, if we have, as I have tried to show, first, a great territory, nearly a thousand miles in width, demanding this outlet; secondly, a territory capable of a very high degree of agricultural development, to which this road is a necessity; and thirdly, a chain of great lakes, running from east to west, reaching half way across the continent and to the very point where this road proposes to commence, and forming a connecting link in this great system of continental communication—if we have all these things, Mr. Speaker, in our favor, can this House deny us what it has given so liberally to all other projects—a grant of the public lands?

But there is still another argument which has just been brought to bear against this bill. It is said that we should keep the public lands to pay the public debt. Let us consider this.

I had occasion, a few days since, in some remarks I made upon another question, to allude hurriedly to the same objection now raised here; and nothing but the respect which I entertain for the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who has made the objection at this time, would induce me to recur to it. It is this: the great interior of the country, as it now lies, unsettled, uninhabited, incapable of settlement—because without the great outlets of rivers, or rails agriculture cannot prosper, for it depends for its growth not upon itself but upon its markets; this great interior region, I say, so situated, is valueless to the people and to the nation. And so long as that region of country remains in the condition in which it now is, it can be of no value to the Government or the people, and its land cannot be worth any conceivable price. But if, by the granting of these lands, you can build up vast communities; if you can develop a mighty country; if you can create great States that will come on this floor by their Representatives and on the floor of the other House by their Senators; if vast populations can be made to cluster around these fertile regions, then you obtain the means of taxation; you obtain men; you obtain the sinews of strength, of government, of power.

Contrast for an instant the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, as they now stand—mighty Commonwealths, inhabited by vast and patriotic and intelligent populations; full of wealth, and prosperity, and happiness—with the value that the territory upon which they are planted would now possess to the nation if it had never been settled. Who will dare to draw the comparison?

This, then, seems to me to be not only the policy of the Government, but it has been its settled, uniform, unvarying policy for a quarter of a century; and it is too late now to attempt to displace or alter it.

But gentlemen may fear that this road may prove a rival to the central road and delay its construction. Be it so.

If this road, by the mere force of its natural advantages, by the agricultural character of the country through which it will pass, by the force of its geographical position, can be built with no aid from Congress save a mere land grant, then indeed is it most unfair to deny it that small boon; more particularly when to a road that lies further south, Congress has given not only a grant of land but an immense loan of bonds of the United States, the interest and the principal of which the people of the Northwest will have, in common with the rest of the nation, to pay. If this road, without bonds, can be built before the other road with that great advantage, then it is most evident that to this road should be given the assistance of the Government. The very dread in which it seems to be held by its rival is the strongest argument in its favor.

We who represent the northern tier of States of this Union ask here simply for a land grant. We are told by officers of the corporation into whose hands it is proposed to confide the building of this road—and I have faith in their assertions—that they mean to build this road, and can build it. The very clause they have inserted in the bill, providing that they shall never be permitted to mortgage the road, looks like good faith. There is no fraud here, for they have cut off, by that provision, the very means of fraud. It looks to me as if they were in earnest in their efforts.

I trust that the House will afford them every opportunity to succeed; and that it will not, at this late day, reverse the policy of the Government by denying to this northern Pacific road less than half the advantages which it has given to its southern competitor; but will generously close its ears to the clamors of rival interests, and do an act of justice, by the passage of this bill, to a vast region of country yet in its infancy of development, but which will eventually prove a thousand-fold more advantageous to the nation than the barren tracts through which that Central road must pass.

Mr. STEVENS took the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. STEVENS. I will yield for five minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, of course I despair of retarding the progress of this bill longer than while I am talking, or of ultimately preventing its passage. I know that when a proposition of this kind is introduced here giving away forty or fifty million acres of lands it is certain to pass, especially under the lead of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] It is at least singular that we should propose to take up and galvanize an obsolete, dead corporation of the State of Maine, a thousand miles away even from its eastern terminus, for a great national work of this kind. If it is a thing proper to be done by Congress, why not create the machinery ourselves and have the credit for it? I do not like the idea of giving away lands to extend the Grand Trunk railroad of Canada. This appears to me to be the object aimed at. I am reminded in this connection that this bill proposing to aid in the building of a railroad over a tract of country in which there are no inhabitants, to reach a State containing only one hundred thousand inhabitants, is like the proposition of a gentleman who formerly represented Oregon here, and who urged upon the Committee of Ways and Means to recommend an appropriation for establishing a fort at Walla-Walla and sending a regiment of soldiers there. It was asked if there were any inhabitants there; he said no, but if we would only build a fort there and place a regiment of men in it there would be. [Laughter.] So it is argued here, that if we build this road we will have inhabitants in the region through which it passes, and that we shall thus develop the resources of the country. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that the more prudent course for us at this time is to husband our resources, such as we have left, to sustain the credit of the Government, and let this stupendous project wait until the commerce of the country will do something toward sustaining the road after it shall be built. This is a most munificent grant, involving, I believe, not less than forty million acres of land; at least there is no agreement among the friends of the measure as to how much it will require, whether thirty-six, forty, or fifty million acres. I hope the House will consider long before they pass a bill of this kind. I can see no trade there is now to support a road through this country except the carrying of a few muskrat skins from the Red river of the North. There is no trade whatever, except the fur trade, beyond the limits of our settlements. If I can have the opportunity I shall move that this bill be postponed till December next.

Mr. GRINNELL. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield me the floor a very few moments.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot yield the floor again. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER announced that Mr. STEVENS having reported the bill was entitled to the floor to close debate.

Mr. STEVENS. I have been somewhat surprised, Mr. Speaker, to see the hostility manifested to this bill, but I have been more surprised to see the quarter from which it comes. However, in this place, where every man acts according to his own judgment and taste, I have no right to find fault about that.

First, let me reply to an objection made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] in reference to the form in which this bill is brought in. It is true this company was chartered by the State of Maine, but it is composed of men who are men of substance, are among the solid men of New England. But the gentleman forgets that precisely such provisions were in the bill for the Central road. When that bill was first reported to the House authorizing a company incorporated by the Government to make it, it evidently broke down. It was found that it could not pass, that it was in fact dead, and suggestions were made to me at that time which induced me to propose a change in the law. I need not tell the House what those reasons were. Objections were made to a company chartered by Congress being permitted to make internal improvements within the limits of States. It is an old objection, as old as the days of Calhoun, or before his time. But there is a large and influential party comprising a large portion of the people of this country who do not concede to Congress the right to charter a company to make internal improvements within a State, although they all admit the power of Congress to construct roads through the public lands.

I do not myself give in my adherence to that idea; but I know that it was in consequence of that idea that the Union Pacific Railroad Company was required to confine its operations within the limits of the Territories of the United States, and that to enable it to connect with the Missouri river authority was given to the Leavenworth and Pawnee Railroad Company of Kansas to construct a road three hundred and sixty or three hundred and seventy miles to the one hundredth parallel of longitude. The Central Pacific Railroad Company of California was authorized to construct a road from the eastern boundary of that State to the Nevada line, with the further privilege that if the Union Pacific road did not meet them there they might go on and extend the road until it was finished; and provision was made for extending to these companies precisely the same power and precisely the same grants that are made to the Union Pacific railroad itself, giving them land, furnishing the bonds of the Government to the extent of $16,000 a mile for a part of the road, to $32,000 a mile for another part, and to $48,000 a mile over the mountains. And no provision was made in that bill requiring them to carry Government troops, arms, and munitions free of cost as has been done in this bill. No gentleman living near the eastern terminus of that road then raised any voice against this munificent grant. No gentleman from that locality then found any fault or any quibbles that the companies authorized to build it were chartered by States.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to state to the gentleman that he has forgotten that when the Union Pacific railroad bill was pending, I did oppose conferring that power upon the Pawnee and Leavenworth Company, and also upon the California Company.

I wish also to correct the gentleman in another respect. By the act which I have before me, creating the corporation known as the Union Pacific Railroad Company, all the powers of that company were created and presented. It is true that it provided that if the company should not be able to build the road as required, the companies constructing the roads in the States lying west of the Mississippi river should construct the road; but at the same time it conferred upon those companies the powers which are conferred by the act upon the Union Pacific Railroad Company. There is no such provision in the bill now pending before the House. This is a charter granted solely by the Legislature of Maine, in which there is no provision reserving the right to alter, amend, or repeal the charter of the company.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will look at it he will see that there is not one of the corporate powers of the Leavenworth and Pawnee Railroad Company, nor one of the corporate powers of the California Railroad Company, defined. Reference is simply had to their charters as existing charters. But they have these subsidies granted, and if they accept these conditions, they are bound to live up to them. So this company, if it accepts the grant upon the conditions we propose, is bound to live up to them, or else the grant of the United States fails. The two cases are identical in principle, and it is not fair to treat them differently.

So much for the purpose of defining why this company is authorized to make the road. It is because we could not authorize anybody else to make it; and it is to be made by some such company chartered by a State, or not made at all. Before I undertook to report this bill, I satisfied myself that this was a substantial company, composed of the best men to be found in Boston and New England; and I satisfied myself that they intended to make the road. I did not see how they could make it very well at this time; but they undertook to do it, and they allowed us to put into the charter not only a provision that they should subscribe for the stock in one half of the time which was allowed to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, but they allowed us to reduce the time of the acceptance of the terms to six months. And altogether, the provisions of this are more stringent than were those in reference to that road.

What, then, have we given them which gentlemen seem so sensitive about? We gave them that which to this nation to-day is not worth a dollar. We gave them land wholly uninhabited, lying in the bleak regions of the North, and which, without some such road as this, never will be inhabited until the great fire shall consume those forests. It is therefore as a means of settling that country, now without one white inhabitant, and it is for the purpose of bringing the alternate sections into value, so that homesteads may be worth something there, that we propose to give this company an opportunity to open up that vast wilderness to civilized man.

And yet gentlemen a little lower down the country, down at this end of the Union Pacific railroad, cannot see it. People even at Chicago cannot see it. Why? Because this road proposes to start from the head of Lake Superior. They know that vessels can start from the head of Lake Superior and go to London by the same length of route, and with just the same caliber and depth of vessel that they could from Chicago.

Now, sir, I have looked a little into this matter, in the fulfillment of my duties as chairman of this committee, and I satisfied myself first, that these men would build the road without a dollar of subsidy from the Government. I do not call the grant of these lands giving away anything. The Government does not sell this land now. The Government at present says that any man who chooses to go and take it may do so by paying simply ten dollars for the surveying expenses. The land is no longer held as part of the national revenue. My eloquent friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] seems not to have remembered at the moment that the land is no longer for sale by the Government of the United States; the whole of it is devoted to the purposes of population; and it is for that same purpose that I urge the building of this great road. What private owner of such land would not say, "Open out a road through it, and you shall have half the land that lies any where within a reasonable distance, to the extent even of a kingdom?" Who would not dispose of it in that way if it were his own, and who would not do it acting disinterestedly in trust for the nation? I think, sir, that this is one of the greatest enterprises of the age, the opening of a railroad from the Pacific ocean to the northern lakes.

I look upon a northwestern railroad from the neighborhood of the great lakes to the Pacific ocean as a great and useful enterprise. It may seem and comparatively is a barren one, as its track lies through a country almost wholly uninhabited. Nor does the settlement and cultivation of the country seem probable, hardly possible, until such a road is built. It can hardly be denied that the settlement of that vast region is among the most desirable objects which an American statesman can contemplate. To those who have but superficially examined the subject, the Northwest, from the forty-sixth degree of north latitude to the Canadian line, seems a bleak, barren waste, scarcely capable of improvement. Yet the facts are very different. The territory north of Nebraska contains a sufficient quantity of arable and grazing land to make eleven or twelve States as large as Virginia or Pennsylvania. A considerable part of it is rocky and mountainous, but not a larger proportion; I think, than of those States. The balance of it, along the river bottoms and vast valleys, is very fertile, producing wheat, rye, corn, barley, and oats of excellent quality, potatoes and grass of a very superior kind and in great abundance. But the mountainous and uncultivable parts will, like the rocky regions of Pennsylvania, be the richest part of the territory. Already gold has been discovered in many parts of it. The richest diggings on the continent are said to be in Idaho. Placers have been found almost or quite to the Canadian line.

On John Day's river have been discovered the richest quartz leads outside of California. Captain Mullan asserts that this region of our unoccupied country is now "sending to our mints as much gold as California in her palmiest days." This seems hardly credible, and yet I know of no higher authority than Captain Mullan. Iron ore and copper are abundant; bituminous coal has been discovered in several places. Petroleum, cinnabar, cannel coal, coal oil springs, and sulphur have been found on the Yellow Stone and other streams. (Mullan's Report, 45.) This is destined, probably, to become one of the richest mining regions of the world. The valleys along the route of the road will not, I suppose, be capable of producing sufficient food for the numerous miners, but the mountains flatten down so that the country north of a direct line is nearly all of it level, and very rich soil. The only objection to it is the climate. But that does not affect the small grains nor grasses; indeed it is believed to be the best grazing country on the continent. Sheep thrive and multiply amazingly, even on the spurs of the Rocky mountains. In all the valleys corn ripens better than in Minnesota and Vermont. As you descend the water-shed toward the Pacific the valleys widen, and the quantity of cultivable land increases. The country around Walla-Walla and beyond it becomes level and rich. I do not suppose the road would stop at the Columbia river, nor seek the ocean in the neighborhood of its mouth; it would probably run to Puget sound, near Seattle, where is the best harbor on the Pacific. I do not suppose that at once it would attract much trade from the East Indies, from Japan and China, but it will not be long before a very important country will be developed which lately belonged to China but now to Russia, which is drained by the waters of the Amoor river. This road would be the nearest outlet for the trade of that great country.

The value of our northwestern possessions depends upon their being populated, and their population depends wholly on the construction of such a road.

I do not speak of the value of our public lands as a source of revenue. That never was of much importance compared with the value of its products. Now they have ceased to be of any marketable value. How, then, can the road be built?

As I said, the company named in this bill is composed of some of the most substantial and enterprising men in the eastern States, and they pledge themselves to build it if this bill passes. Important as is the enterprise, the committee were unwilling to give any grant of lands by the United States as was done to the Union Pacific road; but they felt willing to give them almost any amount of land along the route. By doing so, we really gave away nothing, as the whole of it may be now taken by settlers without paying anything to the Government. The committee feel sure that this is the quickest way of settling it.

Nor is there any danger that settlement will be retarded by the high price which the company will put on the lands. Their own interest will induce them to invite settlement by the lowest price on agricultural lands, trusting for remuneration to the lots in the towns and cities which they may build up along the route, and to the future products of the road. Nothing could be more suicidal to them than to delay the cultivation of the country. They must expect to receive a large portion of their income from the way travel and the transportation of the products of the soil. True, as the road progresses their lands will increase in value and afford them considerable aid.

The practicability of its construction, and of its working both summer and winter, seem to me beyond any doubt. It is found that everywhere until you reach the base of the Rocky mountains the country is more level than in the middle States, and the average cost per mile for grading is much less. Both on the eastern and western slopes rivulets rise in the mountains and run into the Missouri river on the east and the Columbia river on the west, along the valleys of which, without much deviation from a direct line, the road could be located. I do not intend to compare this with any other route. Between them there should be no rivalry, no jealousy. But as compared with the Middle pass or any southern line, it is found that the mountains could be crossed on this line at an elevation from fifteen hundred to two thousand feet less than on any other. Governor Stevens, on the route surveyed by him, recommends two tunnels of considerable length in order to keep down the grade; but later explorations show a pass further north of equal depression without a tunnel. The obstruction by snow on whatever route you take has always been a grave question; one yet to be solved. Whether the mountain can be crossed between the thirty-fifth and forty-third degrees of latitude by locomotives at all times in the winter is not very clear. If at all, it will probably be by laying the superstructure on trestle-work.

There is a curious phenomenon, well attested, with regard to the temperature of the air between the forty-sixth and forty-eighth parallels of latitude. As you go north, until you reach the forty-eighth degree the air becomes much milder. At Walla-Walla, on the Pacific side, in latitude 46°, the temperature is the same as that at Washington city in 38°. In Bitter Root valley, a little above 48°, it is very similar to that at Philadelphia in 40°; and so all the way from the Pacific to Fort Laramie there is a stream of warm atmosphere ranging from two to one hundred miles wide, with a warmer mean temperature than it is eight or ten degrees further south. The result is that within the limits of that stream the snow seldom lies more than two or two and a half feet deep in the coldest winters. This would never obstruct a locomotive on a well-built road. This warm current of air is a curious contrivance in the economy of nature. Up to near the summit of the mountain the mild climate of the Willamette valley and other parts of Oregon is easily accounted for by the warm air which is constantly blowing inland from the tepid waters of the gentle Pacific. But that would not cross the summit of the mountain without losing its heat. Just at that point, between the headwaters of the Missouri, Columbia, and Yellow Stone rivers, boil up an innumerable number of hot springs, so intensely warm as to heat the air in the coldest weather. This air, carried on by the wind, modifies the climate for hundreds of miles in extent. It is in these high northern regions, warmed and fertilized by these ever-burning internal fires, that millions of buffaloes find food and shelter in the bleakest winters. Thus has nature compensated for the absence of a southern sun. Here, it seems to me, the locomotive is destined to pass unobstructed, both summer and winter. Here, too, is to be found fuel, and the purest water from one end of the route to the other. In this it has a great advantage over an extreme southern line. There are hundreds of miles without a drop of good water, or wood, or air. Each have their advantages and disadvantages. When this country shall be restored to peace all of them will be demanded by the wants of trade and of a rich and teeming population on both sides of these mountains of silver and rivers of gold.

The Territories through which this road would run contain about five hundred and sixteen thousand seven hundred and twenty-six square miles. When settled, at least eleven new States would be added to the Union. From Puget sound to either China, Japan, or Calcutta, is from three to four hundred miles nearer than from San Francisco. This would in some measure compensate for the greater population and better climate of California.

The building of this road and settlement of the country would prevent future Indian wars, and save the repetition of the horrible scenes which were lately enacted in Minnesota.

To aid the company the Government are asked to give twenty sections a mile through the States, being twelve thousand acres, which, if it could be sold at the highest Government prices, would be $16,000, and double that in the Territories. To the Union Pacific railroad she granted that sum in bonds and ten sections of land; and across the mountain three times that amount. But we in truth give nothing. Government no longer sells her lands, as I before said.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPALDING and Mr. ROBINSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 49.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, James B. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Donnelly, Eden, Eldridge, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Charles A. Harris, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, K. Hey, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Mc-Bride, McClurg, McIndoe, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Perlman, Price, Pruyn, John H. Rice, Robinson, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, John B. Steele, Stevens, Strong, Stuart, Sweet, William B. Washburn, Wiley, Wheeler, Wilder, Windom, and Yeaman—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Ashley, Beaman, Bliss, Boutwell, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Davidson, Deming, Eckley, Edgerton, Elliot, English, Fenton, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hubbard, Hutchins, Jencks, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kason, Orlando Kellogg, Kemann, Law, Long, Marcy, McDowell, McKim, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James H. Morris, Amos Myers, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Pike, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Spalding, Stiles, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elinor B. Washburne, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—66.

So the bill was not passed.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 342) making appropriation for public buildings in the Territories of Colorado, Nevada, Dakota, Idaho, Arizona, and Montana, and for other purposes.

The bill was taken up and read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has this bill been referred to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It has been, and reported back to the House by the committee.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move to postpone the consideration of the bill one week.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by postponing it until the first Monday of December next.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I hope that will not be done. The Montana bill has not been disposed of yet, and I wish this bill postponed for a short time because a part of the appropriation in it is for that Territory. I call the previous question upon the motion to postpone.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was not agreed to.

The motion to postpone one week was agreed to.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

The next business taken up in order was the bill (H. R. No. 421) to pay in part for the publication of the debates of Congress, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to purchase from the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, in the present and each succeeding Congress, who has not heretofore received the same, one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid to the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, out of the contingent funds of the two Houses, according to the number of copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix taken by each, one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand pages for a long session, or fifteen hundred pages for a short session, including the indexes and the laws of the United States for this and each future Congress.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $98,544 he, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes herein named, for the present Congress; and that $30,494 of the same be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate, and the remainder by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I move to amend by adding the following additional section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend by adding to the first section the following:

To be deposited in some public library to be designated by such Senator, Representative, or Delegate.

Mr. COX. I am opposed to that amendment, and I would like to hear the gentleman's reason for offering it. I am sure that the depositing of these books in the libraries throughout the districts amounts to little or nothing. Members of Congress had better keep the books themselves, for the people come to them sooner than go to these libraries to get information in reference to congressional proceedings. There are already in many of the libraries copies of this work, distributed by former members of Congress, and I think gentlemen will now serve the interests of their constituents best by allowing members of Congress to keep these books in their own libraries.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. Half of the libraries of the country are close corporations. They are private property, and they are the only libraries that can be kept up. Go to any of the country libraries, even those of colleges, or to the State libraries, and you will find that they are like our libraries of Congress, except that here we have faithful officers to look after the books that are taken away and gather them up as fast as they are stolen; but in the country public libraries the books are taken away and never collected again.

If these volumes are given to other libraries, they are private corporations and the books are liable at any time to be sold. I think that the distribution of the Congressional Globe by members of Congress is just as good a distribution as we can make of them. I favored this proposition two years ago, because I think that these books should be scattered through the country. It is the best way of preserving them. The stereotype plates are now stored away, corroding with rust and being gradually destroyed. And so with the printed volumes in the hands of the publisher. I think some steps should be taken to preserve to the country its most valuable history.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I hope the proposition made by the gentleman from Iowa will not be adopted. I think that private distribution by members will be more acceptable to them and to the country generally, as there are a large number of libraries in each district, between which the member would be compelled to select.

The question was taken on Mr. Wilson's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I move to amend by adding the following provision:

Provided, however, That the above provisions be made on the express condition that they may be abrogated by either Congress or the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix at any time after giving two years' notice for that purpose.

This amendment, Mr. Speaker, is offered after consultation with the proprietors of the Globe, and I hope it will be agreed to. It is offered because at this time the expense of printing is very large, and it may be at some future day deemed expedient to fall back upon the old contract. I believe that members generally concede that it is absolutely necessary to do something for the Globe. In the statement which I made to the House some weeks since I put the difference between this proposition and the other at about forty thousand dollars, as found by the books at that time. The intelligent chief clerk of the Globe office has sent me a letter correcting that statement, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

GEORGE A. BAILEY,
Chief Clerk Congressional Globe.
WASHINGTON CITY, April 26, 1864.
DEAR SIR: On reading your remarks of the 21st inst., printed in the Globe of to-day, I perceive that you have underestimated the amount paid to the Globe during the Thirty-Seventh Congress. The total was $166,579, instead of $133,550, the figures given by you; being, in round numbers, $33,000 short of the full amount. Fifty per cent. additional on this sum, or $16,500 added to the $166,775, named by you as the sum required to meet the demands of the second proposition submitted to you on the 18th of March last, makes $183,275, and reduces, by more than one half, the sum stated as the difference of cost between the two propositions; and shows the first proposition to cost only about fifteen thousand dollars more than the second. I regard this as a very important point, and feel sure that you will be glad to have it in your power to correct the error in advance of any discussion that may arise when the subject shall come up again.

I am, very respectfully,

GEORGE A. BAILEY.

Chief Clerk Congressional Globe.
Hon. AMBROSE W. CLARK, Chairman Committee on Printing, House of Representatives United States. Present.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Is it in order to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I make that motion, and call for the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. A. MYERS. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question, if he will withdraw the previous question to permit me to do so.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. A. MYERS. I understood the other proposition, of which the chairman of the Committee on Printing spoke, to be a cheaper one than this. Is it not so?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. A. MYERS. I was in hopes that the gentleman from New York would offer a substitute for this bill containing the other proposition.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. The other proposition is on file and may be read.

Mr. A. MYERS. That is what I want. I hope the House will vote down this bill and pass the other.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New York permit the other proposition in regard to compensation to be brought up, and let the House choose between the two?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I have no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that one thing is certain in the matter, and that is that the Globe must have further compensation in order that it may be carried on. I am sure there is no member here who does not feel that the publication of that work should be continued. It is the record of our proceedings, through which our constituents know what we have been doing here. It is the official record of Congress. I think it is our duty, even in behalf of our constituents, to keep it up even at a much larger expense than at present. All that I desire to know is which is the best means to accomplish this end. The gentleman from New York [Mr. A. W. CLARK] has examined the question very thoroughly, and if he thinks that the purchase of these volumes of the Congressional Globe is the best means of accomplishing the object, the House must determine. If, on the other hand, he thinks that a direct compensation ought to be made, that would comport more fully with my own sense of what is right and proper to be done in the premises.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois I will state that when the memorial in this matter was presented to us at a joint meeting of the committee, I was in favor of accepting the proposition to increase the compensation. The committee, however, was equally divided, and I was instructed to report both propositions to the House, which I did. The House on hearing them instructed the committee to report a bill embodying the proposition for purchasing back volumes of the Congressional Globe, and that bill is now before the House.

Gentlemen ask me which is the more expensive. The one gives to each new member of the House who was not in the Thirty-Fourth Congress a full set of the Globe. It also gives to every Senator and Delegate a perfect set of sixty-two volumes. That carries out the original bargain with Mr. Rives, which bargain was violated by a clause in the compensation act cutting off the distribution of books to members. The amount of matter, too, has been considerably increased since the contract was first made, and it is asked that that increase shall be paid for at the rate of two mills for every additional page. That will amount to about forty-two thousand dollars, which, added to the cost of the books, will make the whole sum necessary to be appropriated $98,000. The acceptance of the other proposition would require the payment of within $15,000 of that amount, and no books to be furnished. I think, therefore, that the proposition now before the House is the cheapest, though I have uniformly been an advocate for the advance pay, as I do not favor the plan of voting books to members. I have prepared this bill by the instruction of the House. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was first on the amendment proposed by Mr. A. W. CLARK.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. MORRILL demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. For the information of the House, I desire the Speaker to say—

[Calls of "Question," "Question."]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot put an inquiry that will be in the nature of debate.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to know whether the price of these books will come out of the pockets of members. [Calls to order.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer the question.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers on the passage of the bill.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division—yeas 76, nays 26.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays on the latter motion, and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Cox for two days to visit wounded soldiers at Fredericksburg.

On motion of Mr. PENDLETON, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted indefinitely to Mr. Le BLOND, on account of sickness in his family.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill relative to the public printing; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PATTY D. BUFORD.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting a pension to Patty D. Buford, widow of Major General John Buford; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

The SPEAKER stated the business in order to be the consideration of the bill in regard to the reciprocity treaty; on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STILES. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. WARD. I will give way for that motion.

Mr. STILES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 17, 1864.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the second annual report of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, showing the condition of its affairs on the 1st day of March, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Mrs. Sarah P. Mather, of the city of New York, praying for the extension of a patent for a submarine lamp and telescope; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a telegraphic communication from the Governor and other officers of the Territory of Colorado, praying that the time for voting on the adoption of the constitution for that Territory on its admission as a State may be changed to the second Tuesday in September; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a memorial of W. B. Lawton and others, engaged in the express business in the State of Rhode Island, remonstrating against any change in the manner of taxing express companies; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of men and women of Cooper, Michigan, praying for the abolition of slavery and for the adoption of measures for so amending the Constitution as forever to prohibit its existence in any portion of our common country; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a petition from the National Clubs of the city of New York and vicinity, adopted at a general meeting of the clubs, and signed by their president, Frederick Schütz, and their secretary, Charles F. L. Blankmeister. It appears that these National Clubs, as they are entitled, are composed of naturalized Germans, numbering upwards of sixteen hundred. In this petition, which is very carefully drawn, they represent that the nation has an inalienable right to its whole domain, and therefore all the rebel States have been absorbed in one single Territory of the United States of America, inhabited by persons declared to have no more rights than alien enemies by the decisions of the courts of the United States. They then proceed to declare, first, that they have looked upon the proclamation of the President, dated Washington, December 8, 1863, with the greatest apprehension, as failing to afford any guarantee that the chief element of discord which produced the lamentable civil war will be irrevocably removed, and also as striking at the rights of Congress. In the second place, they say that they have hailed with joy the passing, in the House of Representatives, on the 4th of May, 1864, of the bill prescribing minutely the mode of constructing States out of the territory of the rebel States, and vindicating the privileges of Congress. And thirdly, they say that they have noticed that in this bill the right of suffrage is confined exclusively to white persons, thereby continuing an unjust and dangerous distinction of races politically. And fourthly, they appeal to the Senate of the United States to adhere to the principle adopted in the bill to organize the Territory of Montana, and so amend the bill of the House of Representatives as to strike out the word "white," affirming thereby that the eternal principles of right furnish the justest, as well as the safest, guidance for truly democratic legislation. As this subject is now before the Committee on Territories, I move that the petition be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and presents resolutions of a committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, asking relief from the unequal action of the law imposing fifty per cent. additional duty on imports.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been requested to ask that that memorial may be read. It is short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the memorial, as follows:

Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York to the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York respectfully represents to the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States that the decision of the Treasury Department, contained in a circular letter of the 5th instant, bears with great hardship upon the merchants of this city, and doubtless equally so on merchants in other seaports of the country. The following is an exact copy of the circular referred to:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 5.

In view of the numerous inquiries as to the time when the recent enactment increasing duties on imports went into operation, the following instruction is published for the government of collecting officers:

"The joint resolution of April 29, enacting the increase, took effect from its passage, and it has been judicially decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that under the acts increasing duties from and after their passage, the increase provided for takes effect on the day of passage. The Secretary is constrained, therefore, to hold that the increase required by the joint resolution took effect on the 29th of April, and that consequently all persons who have paid duties at former rates on that or any following day, are liable to pay the additional fifty per cent.

"All collectors and all surveyors charged with the collection of customs will be governed accordingly."

S. P. CHASE,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, the facts upon which your memorialists rely to prove the hardship of this decision are briefly these:

On the 25th day of April, the House of Representatives passed a joint resolution imposing an additional duty of fifty per cent. on all imports into the United States for the term of sixty days, pending a revision of the tariff. On the 28th day of April the same resolution was adopted by the Senate, and it went to the President of the United States for his signature. Nothing more was heard of this resolution till Saturday, the 30th of April, at one and a half o'clock, p. m., when, upon orders from Washington, the collector refused to receive money for duties under the old law. Throughout Friday, and the early part of Saturday, merchants were very active, as they had been from the first passage of the resolution referred to by the House of Representatives, in entering their merchandise as it arrived, and paying duties thereon under the preëxisting law; and for their better security in the premises, most of the goods were entered immediately for consumption, and these lost all the advantages and all the privileges of bonded goods. This was especially the case on Friday and Saturday. The amount of gold paid into the custom-house on those two days was about one and a half million dollars; the great demand for coin keeping the premium at eighty per cent. or thereabouts. In most cases the goods thus entered were not required for immediate consumption, and not being needed to meet any present wants, would naturally have been deposited in bonded warehouses to wait demand, or till the action of Congress in readjusting the tariff should be better understood. These goods are now in the warehouses of the importers, unsold, with the premium on gold rapidly declining.

Your memorialists do not, in the present instance, complain that, with a suddenness almost unexampled, fifty per cent. additional duties are imposed on all foreign goods imported into the country, for they know that steam and telegraphic communication have rendered a departure from the former usage necessary, and they are ready to bow to the necessity. But, for the same reason, they urge upon your honorable bodies that when laws are made they should be promulgated; that if the joint resolution adding fifty per cent. to the duties on imports was a law on Friday, it should have been known on Friday; and that there is no reason why the merchants of this city, or any other city of the Union, should be exposed to the evils of an ex post facto law, for such, under the decision of the Treasury Department, would be the operation of the joint resolution if thus enforced. Nor would your memorialists call in question the propriety of a decision that is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States under circumstances precisely analogous, but they are not aware that in the cases referred to, goods, after having once been permitted to enter under all the forms and sanctions of one law, have been a second time subjected to duty under a new and distinct law, to the forfeiture of all the privileges to which the merchant would have been entitled, had not the forms of law been fully complied with, by the mutual act of the agents of the Government and his own.

Nor can they recognize the justice of being obliged a second time to pay duty on merchandise for which they have received landing permits under the circumstances contemplated, for the following reasons:

First. That the custom duties being paid in coin, the fortunes of war may shortly lead to a very serious decline in the premium on gold, and thus entail upon the importer a loss which will not be felt by the later importations.

Second. Because the sixty days contemplated by the joint resolution may pass without an extension of the provisions of that enactment, or a new adjustment by Congress of the existing tariff.

Third. Because in the readjustment of the tariff, Congress may not deem it wise to impose an additional duty of fifty per cent. on all imports.

Fourth, and finally. Because under the uncertainties connected with the war, the currency, and future legislation of Congress, the merchant is powerless to effect a sale of his merchandise, while he has lost the control over it which he would have enjoyed if it had been entered in bond.

In view of these things, your memorialists feel that it is their right and their duty to protest against the unequal operation of the joint resolution, if enforced alike against goods that once paid duty in the manner described, and id such was not so admitted to entry when the law was perfected by its return to Congress with the signature of the President affixed thereto, and announced to the collector of the port.

Professing their willingness to abide by laws when duly enacted and duly promulgated, they earnestly desire to be saved from the evils of litigation which will inevitably result from the ambiguities involved in the recent enactment, and the decision so adverse to their interests, to which it has given rise.

And in order that such injustice and such litigation may be avoided, your memorialists would earnestly urge the prompt passage of a joint resolution embracing the following points.

Resolved, That the joint resolution of Congress, signed by the President on the 29th day of April last, imposing fifty per cent. additional duties on goods imported, does not apply to goods in bond at the time of the passage of the act, and that the additional fifty per cent. shall not be levied upon goods upon which importers had paid the old duty before notice was received at the different custom-houses that no more duties should be received under the old law.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

[Tr. S.]

GEORGE WILSON, Assistant Secretary.

NEW YORK, May 14, 1864.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 250) to amend the act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1856; reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 278) prescribing the terms on which exemplifications shall be furnished by the General Land Office; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of causing all the unsurveyed lands in the State to be surveyed and brought into market at the earliest practicable day, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 203) authorizing a grant to the State of California of the Yosemite valley and of the land embracing the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 355) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to stipulate for the release from attachment or other process of property claimed by the United States, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 207) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications, and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th June, 1865, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That twenty-five hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for the year 1863, be printed for the use of the Commissioner.

SELECTION OF SWAMP LANDS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 164) to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands," approved March 2, 1855, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back with two amendments, and as it is but one section, and of no great consequence, I suggest that it be passed now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The first section provides that the act for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands, approved March 2, 1855, shall be continued in force and extended to all such lands entered, located, reported, or selected since its passage.

The second section proposes to allow the several States two years in addition to the time limited by the act to extend the provisions of an act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits, to Minnesota and Oregon, and for other purposes, approved March 12, 1860, within which to make selections of swamp and overflowed lands within such several States, and to report the same to the surveyor general of the district in which such lands may be situated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was to strike out the first section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was in the second line of the second section, after the word "years" to insert "after the passage of this act," so as to read, "that the several States shall be allowed two years after the passage of this act, in addition to the time," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS its title was amended to read; "A bill to extend the time within which the States may complete their selections of swamp lands."

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 54) providing for changing the time of voting upon the constitution of Colorado; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

WILKES COURT OF INQUIRY.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate the proceedings and finding of the naval court of inquiry in the case of Commodore Charles Wilkes.

Mr. SUMNER. Has not the Senate acted on that already?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. Such a resolution has been passed, I think.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LAND OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. HARLAN, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That one thousand additional copies of the last annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be printed for the use of that office.

BANK REPORTS.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate copies of the full reports of the banks, associations, corporations, and individuals doing a banking business, which are required to be made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863; and that in communicating said reports he be requested to cause those required to be made within thirty days after the 1st day of October, 1863, and those required to be made six months thereafter, to be arranged in separate tables.

Mr. CONNESS. I will suggest to the Senator from Missouri that, as the chairman of the Committee on Finance, whose department it affects, is not in his seat, the consideration of that resolution be postponed until he comes in.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate a statement showing the full amount of the public debt of the United States at the present date; and that in making said statement he cause to be arranged separately the several items of said indebtedness; under what law each item occurred, whether it bears interest, and if so, whether in coin or lawful money; the amount of Treasury notes, United States notes, fractional currency, certificates of indebtedness, temporary loans, &c., and the rate of interest, if any, paid on each of said items, with the date and title of the act under which each class was issued.

Mr. CONNESS. I prefer that that resolution should lie over until the chairman of the Finance Committee is in his seat. I notice that it calls for a very voluminous report. I ask the assent of the Senator to its lying over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must lie over, if objected to, and the Chair understands the Senator as objecting.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 12th instant, an act (S. No. 172) concerning the disposition of convicts in the courts of the United States, for subsisting of persons confined in jails charged with violating the laws of the United States, and for diminishing the expenses in relation thereto.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 421) to pay, in part, for publishing the debates of Congress, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (S. No. 21) to provide for the printing of official reports of the operations of the Army of the United States;

A joint resolution (S. No. 37) for the payment of expenses incurred by the joint committee on the conduct of the war;

A bill (S. No. 139) for the relief of Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, of Goshoot county, Ohio; and

A bill (S. No. 197) for the relief of Charles L. Nelson.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 421) to pay, in part, for publishing the debates of Congress, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ADDITIONAL ILLINOIS CONGRESSMAN.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) providing for the election of a member of Congress for the State of Illinois by the State at large was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That resolution is very short, and if the Senate will allow it to be read I think there will be no objection to passing it at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the joint resolution now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before that consent is given I should like to hear the resolution read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at large for information.

The Secretary read the resolution, which provides that in the election of Representatives to Congress from the State of Illinois the additional Representative allowed to that State by an act fixing the number of the House of Representatives from and after the 3d day of March, 1863, approved March 4, 1862, may be elected by the State at large until the State shall be districted by the Legislature thereof for the election of the fourteenth members to which the State is now entitled by law.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can explain in a moment, as the Senate does not seem to recollect, the occasion for this resolution. Under the law as it stood, at the time the apportionment was made, the State of Illinois was entitled to thirteen members of Congress. Her Legislature was then in session and districted the State for thirteen members. Subsequently, the Legislature adjourned leaving these districts for thirteen members. Congress, however, afterwards altered the ratio of apportionment so as to apportion to the State of Illinois fourteen members. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] understands all about it. That gave us another member, but our State had already been districted for thirteen, and the State has not been redistricted since. We passed a law two years ago allowing the fourteenth member to be elected by the State at large. We have one such member in the House of Representatives now, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN;] and this resolution proposes to continue that law until the State redistricts for the fourteenth member.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator, was that law limited to one election?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was limited to one election; and that is the reason why this joint resolution is necessary.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not so understand. The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREEN CLAY GOODLOE.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) relating to Green Clay Goodloe was read twice by its title.

Mr. POWELL. I ask that that resolution be put on its passage now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that nothing in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1865," approved April 1, 1864, shall be so construed as to prevent the reappointment of Green Clay Goodloe by the President of the United States to a cadetship at the Military Academy.

Mr. POWELL. This young man, I understand, was appointed by the President to the West Point Academy from one of the seceded States. Previous to his appointment he had been in the Army for two years. He went into the Army when he was about sixteen years old. His examination at the Academy after being there six months was not very good, and, under the advice of the professors, he resigned. The board of visitors, I understand, recommended his appointment; but in consequence of a provision in the Military Academy bill passed this year the President cannot reappoint him. The object of this resolution is to enable him to be reappointed to the Academy. He is said to be a very worthy young gentleman, and this is the only case of the kind. All the others in his condition, I understand, were reappointed before the passage of that law. The Senator from Indiana knows the facts more particularly than I do, and he can state them to the Senate. I hope the resolution will be passed.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have no doubt that this resolution ought to pass. Green Clay Goodloe is now in his eighteenth year. He volunteered as a private early in the war, and served two years faithfully and gallantly. In September last he was appointed a cadet to West Point; but having been in the Army so long at his age he could not stand a very good examination the first year in one of his studies. He was behind only in one study. He was allowed to resign, and the board unanimously recommended him for reappointment. If it had been then done there would have been no difficulty; but he supposed that on the recommendation of the board he would be immediately reinstated without any effort on his part. Hence there was a delay of a few weeks, and until after the law passed April 1, 1864, which prohibited the President from making any appointments from the districts in the seceded States, he having been appointed from the second district of Mississippi.

There were two or three other young men at West Point in precisely the same condition with him. They were advised to resign as Goodloe was, and did resign, and were reappointed before the 1st day of April; Goodloe's case is the only exception. The resolution simply allows the President to reappoint him according to the unanimous recommendation of the academic board. He cannot do it under the law now, because we passed a law saying that he shall not appoint for vacancies in these seceded States. Goodloe was appointed from one of those States, and this resolution simply authorizes the President to reappoint him from the district from which he was originally appointed.

Mr. FOOT. In what branch of study did he fail?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That is not stated. The excuse given is that he went into the Army at sixteen, and was eighteen years old at the first examination, the six months examination. The board unanimously recommended his reappointment.

The resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

D. FITZGERALD AND J. BALL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House of Representatives have returned the bill (S. No. 244) for the relief of Daniel Fitzgerald and Jonathan Ball, for which a message was sent by the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I moved the reconsideration of that bill. It was requested to be returned for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan yesterday moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed by the Senate, and the question will be, "Will the Senate reconsider its vote passing the bill?"

Mr. CHANDLER. I will withdraw the request for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over for the present.

Mr. COLLAMER. As I understand, the time for reconsideration will run out soon, and that bill, if it is desired to be reconsidered, should be reconsidered now, and then it may lie for action afterwards.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is entered, which retains the bill, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understood the Senator to withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Michigan does not desire present action upon his motion, but the motion stands.

MARIPOSA BIG TREE GROVE.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 203, reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FOOT] this morning from the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 203) authorizing a grant to the State of California of the "Yosemite valley" and of the land embracing the "Mariposa Big Tree Grove."

The first section of the bill provides that there shall be granted to the State of California the "cleft" or "gorge" in the Granite peak of the Sierra Nevada mountains, situated in the county of Mariposa and the headwaters of the Merced river, and known as the Yosemite valley, with its branches or spurs in estimated length fifteen miles, and in average width one mile back from the main edge of the precipice on each side of the valley, with the stipulation, nevertheless, that the State is to accept this grant upon the express conditions that the premises are to be held for public use, resort, and recreation, and are to be inalienable for all time; but leases, not exceeding ten years, may be granted for portions of the premises. All incomes derived from leases of privileges are to be expended in the preservation and improvement of the property, or the roads leading thereto; the boundaries to be established at the cost of the State by the United States surveyor general of California, whose official plat, when affirmed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, is to constitute the evidence of the locus, extent, and limits of the cleft or gorge. The premises are to be managed by the Governor of the State, with eight other commissioners, to be appointed by the Executive of California, and who are to receive no compensation for their services.

The second section provides that there shall likewise be granted to the State of California the tracts embracing what is known as the "Mariposa Big Tree Grove," not to exceed the area of four sections, and to be taken in legal subdivisions of one quarter section each, with the like stipulation as expressed in the first section of this act as to the State's acceptance, with like conditions as to inalienability, yet with the same lease privilege; the income to be expended in the preservation, improvement, and protection of the property; the premises to be managed by commissioners, as stipulated in the first section, and to be taken in legal subdivisions, and the official plat of the United States surveyor general, when affirmed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to be the evidence of the locus of the "Mariposa Big Tree Grove."

Mr. CONNESS. I will state to the Senate that this bill proposes to make a grant of certain premises located in the Sierra Nevada mountains, in the State of California, that are for all public purposes worthless, but which constitute, perhaps, some of the greatest wonders of the world. The object and purpose is to make a grant to the State, on the stipulations contained in the bill, that the property shall be inalienable forever, and preserved and improved as a place of public resort, to be taken charge of by gentlemen to be appointed by the Governor, who are to receive no compensation for their services, and who are to undertake the management and improvement of the property by making roads leading thereto and adopting such other means as may be necessary for its preservation and improvement. It includes a grant of a few sections of ground upon which one of the celebrated big tree groves of that State is located, of which most Senators doubtless have heard. The trees contained in that grove have no parallel, perhaps, in the world. They are subject now to damage and injury; and this bill, as I have before stated, proposes to commit them to the care of the authorities of that State for their constant preservation, that they may be exposed to public view, and that they may be used and preserved for the benefit of mankind. It is a matter involving no appropriation whatever. The property is of no value to the Government. I make this explanation that the Senate may understand what the purpose is.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the Senator from California whether the State of California—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the special order of the day, the time fixed for its consideration having arrived.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will lie over for the present.

Mr. WILSON. Let it go over informally for a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken, if there be no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the Senator from California whether the State of California has intimated any wish that we should thus make this grant to them, and how it comes about that we propose making it.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut and to the Senate, that they may understand it, that the application comes to us from various gentlemen in California, gentlemen of fortune, of taste, and of refinement, and the plan proposed in this bill has been suggested by them, that this property be committed to the care of the State. I submitted the plan as presented by these gentlemen to the Land Office, and the bill now before the Senate has been prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who also takes a great interest in the preservation both of the Yosemite valley and the Big Tree Grove. Such was the origin of the measure, and such are its purposes.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not by any means mean to intimate any opposition to the bill; but it struck me as being rather a singular grant, unprecedented so far as my recollection goes, and unless the State through her appropriate authorities signified some wish in the matter; it might be deemed by the State officious on our part to make a grant of this kind.

Mr. CONNESS. Ordinarily I should hope I spoke for the State of California here. I feel authorized to do so under existing circumstances. There is no parallel, and can be no parallel for this measure, for there is not, as I stated before, on earth just such a condition of things. The Mariposa Big Tree Grove is really the wonder of the world, containing those magnificent monarchs of the forest that are from thirty to forty feet in diameter.

Mr. DAVIS. How old?

Mr. CONNESS. Well, sir, they are estimated to reach an age of three thousand years. There are two such groves in the State. One is known as the Mariposa grove, the one contemplated in this bill; and the other is known as the Calaveras grove. From the Calaveras grove some sections of a fallen tree were cut during and pending the great World's Fair that was held in London some years since. One joint of the tree was sectionized and transported to that country in sections, and then set up there. The English who saw it declared it to be a Yankee invention, made from beginning to end; that it was an utter untruth that such trees grew in the country; that it could not be; and, although the section of the tree was transported there at an expense of several thousand dollars, we were not able to convince them that it was a specimen of American growth. They would not believe us. The purpose of this bill is to preserve one of these groves from devastation and injury. The necessity of taking early possession and care of these great wonders can easily be seen and understood.

Mr. FOSTER. I certainly did not mean to say anything which implied that the honorable Senator from California had not the most perfect and entire right to speak for his State, and I am at a loss to understand what I was so unfortunate as to say which led him to suppose that I doubted it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now resume the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday; being the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, the pending question being upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to the ninth section of the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs to the House amendment. The Senator from Iowa proposed to strike out the word "colonel" and insert "major," so as to give the Assistant Judge Advocate General the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major of cavalry.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Richardson, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilkinson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Dixon, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Powell, Saulsbury, Sumner, Ten Eyck, and Wilson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Fessenden, Harding, Hicks, Howard, McDougall, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Willey, and Wright—13.

So the amendment of Mr. GRIMES was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That ordinarily would be the question; but the yeas and nays were ordered and taken yesterday on that question. Perhaps, however, that vote may have been regarded as reconsidered, and the vote will be again taken.

Mr. FOOT. That is what I supposed. The vote on agreeing to the amendment of the committee was reconsidered with a view to reach this amendment.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section of the committee's amendment, to strike out and insert, if it be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not in order at the present time.

Mr. POWELL. Will it be in order after this vote is taken?

Mr. WILSON. Let the amendments of the committee be disposed of. There are some other amendments yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended, to insert the eighth, ninth, and tenth sections. On this question the yeas and nays were yesterday ordered and taken, but the Chair will put the vote viva voce unless some Senator desires the yeas and nays again.

The proposed sections were read, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be attached to, and made a part of, the War Department, during the continuance of the present rebellion, a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Military Justice, to which shall be returned for revision the records and proceedings of all the courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the armies of the United States, and in which a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the head of said bureau, a Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, and one Assistant Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major of cavalry. And the said Judge Advocate and his assistant shall receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of the courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the armies of the United States, and perform such other duties as have heretofore been performed by the Judge Advocate General of the armies of the United States.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall have power to appoint for said bureau one fourth class, one third class, one second class, and two first class clerks.

Mr. HALE. Is it in order to amend that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HALE. Then I move to amend it by striking out the words "with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general," and inserting "with a salary of $5,000 per annum," for the Judge Advocate General; and by striking out the words "with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major of cavalry," and inserting "with an annual salary of $3,500," for the assistant.

Mr. WILSON. Is that amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a question of order is raised, the Chair will state that the House of Representatives amended the bill by striking it out and inserting a substitute for it; and that substitute returning here, is to be considered as an original bill. To that bill, the Committee on Military Affairs propose an amendment, and that amendment is now open to amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to make another point of order. The Senate by a vote has inserted certain words in the section, and now the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire is to strike out those words and to insert others. I know that a few weeks ago, when I proposed just in this stage of a bill so to strike out and insert, the President of the Senate decided that it could not be done, because that would be simply undoing what the Senate had immediately before done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a new point of order, and the Chair will make inquiry, in regard to it, as he was not occupying the chair at the time the amendment referred to was made.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair allow me a single moment? I appreciate the point taken by the Senator from Indiana, and if I had moved to strike out only the words which the Senate inserted, the motion would not be in order; but I have moved to strike out other words with them, and to insert a substitute. My amendment, therefore, is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that this amendment is not precisely what the Senator from Indiana supposed, but it is to strike out other words also which have been inserted, and further to insert words. That is in order.

Mr. FOOT. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire proposes not only to strike out the words which have been inserted on a distinct motion, but other words in connection with them, which makes it a different proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no doubt of it.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I am opposed to the amendment. I hold that the officer to whom it is proposed to give a salary of $5,000 a year, the Judge Advocate General, is nothing but a military justice of the peace; and I am utterly opposed to paying a military justice of the peace $5,000 and his deputy $3,500 salary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But without the amendment he will get more than that. The amendment reduces the salary. If the Senator is opposed to giving him $5,000 he will not accomplish his object by voting against the amendment, for if the bill stands as it is, without the amendment, he will have $6,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not so understand the facts. I thought he would get about four thousand eight hundred.

Mr. HALE. No; $6,000.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well. I will vote for the amendment—anything to reduce the salary of a military justice of the peace!

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Dixon, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Cowan, Fessenden, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Willey, and Wright—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reported by the committee will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the Government shall furnish transportation and subsistence to discharged officers and soldiers from the place of their discharge to the place of their enrollment, or original muster into the service, they shall not be entitled to travel, pay, or commutation of subsistence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next proposition of the committee is to amend the fourth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives by adding the words "without rations."

Mr. TEN EYCK. I wish to have the sense of the Senate on this proposed amendment. I understand that its effect will be to take about three hundred dollars, which is the value of the rations a paymaster's clerk receives, from the emoluments he will receive if the amendment does not prevail. The fourth section of the House amendment which it is proposed to amend reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the pay of clerks of paymasters in the Army of the United States shall be $1,200 per annum.

The proposed amendment is to add to that section the words "without rations," so that the effect of the amendment, if it prevails, will be to confine the salary of the paymasters' clerks to $1,200 per annum, $100 a month. As salaries are being paid, to efficient officers discharging duties of this responsible character that in my opinion will be too low. Most of the paymasters' clerks are men of efficiency in business; the character of their employment requires that they should be so, and the responsibility is a very great one. They receive, I think, now about one thousand dollars a year.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think they receive seventy-five dollars a month, and a ration a day.

Mr. TEN EYCK. My impression is from what I have heard on this subject, though I have not been particularly informed, that the receipts of a paymaster's clerk heretofore have been about one thousand dollars per annum. I know that many men who were in quite good business at home sought these positions with the idea that they were to better their condition by them; some of them men of good business qualifications, and married persons; and they have found that they cannot possibly live and maintain themselves here on that salary, and many of them have held on with a hope and expectation that their salaries would be increased. I think we should do more harm and injury to the public service in this branch of it by adopting a measure which will in all probability deprive the public service of the services of men of good character, men of the class that have been employed in these positions, than by suffering the section to stand as the House of Representatives have passed it. With that view, I shall content myself with asking for a vote of the Senate on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. WILSON. The House of Representatives, in the fourth section of their amendments to this bill, provide that hereafter the pay of clerks of paymasters in the Army shall be $1,200 per annum. I believe now the paymasters' clerks receive $700 per annum and their traveling expenses, or so much a mile when traveling, and a certain amount for rations, amounting, I think, to about two hundred and seventy dollars a year. Their whole pay is about nine hundred and seventy dollars a year, including the rations. The Senate Committee on Military Affairs thought this a very large increase from $700 to $1,200 for these officers. We thought that if we allowed these clerks $1,200 without rations, when they have heretofore had $700 with rations and their actual traveling expenses, it would be sufficient. We propose to put them on the same footing with first-class clerks in the various Departments here, $1,200 a year, without any ration. If they get the ration they will get something like one thousand four hundred and seventy dollars. We thought this a very large increase. We thought $1,200 a year would be ample, and therefore we offered this amendment to insert the words "without rations," so that they will get the round sum of $1,200 a year.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is true that the amount which the bill will give, as it is proposed to be amended, is the same as is given to many of the clerks in the civil departments of the Government; but the responsibility of this particular class of clerks is very great.

Mr. WILSON. That is the paymaster's responsibility.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it is the paymaster's responsibility; but the paymaster, in the nature of things, is obliged to trust to his clerk, and he requires a bond from the clerk, and the Government requires a bond from the paymaster, and that bond is about twenty thousand dollars. I have reason to know that a good many of these paymasters have lost very considerably, either by the want of integrity on the part of their clerks or by the want of efficiency; and the paymasters with whom I have conversed have become satisfied that such a salary should be offered as would secure first-rate men. It is not only the capacity that we want, but it is the character that we want. There is not one of these paymasters' clerks now who is considered as entirely adequate to the duties of the station, considering all its responsibility and capacity, who cannot get more by going into private employment than he is getting here. The amount now, I believe, is about eight or nine hundred dollars a year. This will raise it to $1,200 if you take away the ration, and the whole increase will be some two or three hundred dollars. The ration amounts to between two and three hundred dollars, I believe—$270 I am told. This, then, would give them $1,470 without the amendment of the committee.

Now, I submit to the Senate, looking to the character of the service that these men are obliged to perform, that that is quite a small sum to give them; and no matter how vigilant the paymaster may be, it is impossible that he shall not be obliged at times to rely on the capacity and integrity of his clerk. I hope, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the committee will not be adopted, but that these clerks will get their $1,200, as the other House intended, with the ration.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is another reason, I understand, why this amendment should not be adopted. I understand that the paymasters' clerks who are constantly compelled to travel in discharge of their duties have no allowance for that. I understand that out of their salary they have to pay their traveling expenses, and that would probably reduce the net salary proposed to be allowed as low as that of the first-class clerks in the Departments, and they certainly have much higher responsibilities than first-class clerks in the Departments.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, there are four classes of clerks in the Departments, first, second, third, and fourth class, with the respective salaries of $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800. I venture to say there is not a clerk in either one of these Departments of any value who has not been advanced one or two grades in his clerkship within the period of time that most of the clerks of paymasters have been in the service; and I myself have no idea from the little knowledge I have of the relative duties performed by these different classes of persons, that the duties and responsibilities of the clerks in the Departments approximate at all to the responsibilities and duties of the paymasters' clerks in the Army. Many of them from the North are in the South, at New Orleans, near Charleston, and at other points, exposed to all kinds of hardships and exposures, want of quarters and everything of that kind, and many of them, scores of them, are first-rate men whom the Government cannot very well have displaced that a new lot may come in untried and inexperienced. It cannot well afford to lose the services of those men who must resign these positions, many of them, unless this increase of salary shall take place. I have never shown a disposition to encroach on the Treasury; and yet I can understand that there is as much reason in this thing as there is in giving $5,000 to the head of the new bureau which we are about establishing, although the relative service of each class of officers is very different. I do not mean to make any struggle about it or contest it, but it strikes me as being manifestly just and reasonable, and therefore it is that I insist upon a vote on the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am in favor of the highest salary proposed by the honorable Senator from New Jersey for the clerks of paymasters, and would vote for even a higher one. The paymaster's clerk discharges a more important and responsible duty than clerks here in your Departments, and you pay some of them $1,800. A paymaster of necessity is constantly on the move, and he has to take his clerk with him. Every month, or every two months—that is as often, I believe, as they are paying now—they travel from the place where they make their payments to the place where they receive their money, the general headquarters, wherever that may be. You propose to make them discharge the most responsible duty of a paymaster in that department, that they shall do all this traveling and all this ser-vise for $1,200 a year. It is entirely too small and ought to be more.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before I vote I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if, in addition to this compensation, these clerks will be entitled to traveling expenses under the law if this amendment be adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I am not able to answer that question definitely; but I have always understood that the pay of a paymaster's clerk was $700 a year, actual traveling expenses, no more, and one ration a day, and that the ration in the aggregate amounted to about two hundred and seventy dollars a year, making about nine hundred and seventy dollars in all. This increase of pay, as I understand it, would be an addition of $500 a year to each paymaster's clerk. The committee thought it too large an increase. That they had too little, nobody can doubt. The pay is very small, $700 a year to a competent man. We thought, however, that $1,200 a year without any rations, putting them on the same footing with first-class clerks, would be about right. If the Senate thinks otherwise, very well.

Mr. HENDERSON. I presume that if these clerks were entitled to traveling expenses before they certainly will be under the law if the amendment be passed as now proposed.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. In that view of the subject, I shall vote against any increase of payment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I never heard that they get any traveling expenses.

Mr. HENDERSON. We certainly ought to be able to determine about that. That is a very important consideration. If traveling expenses are paid to these clerks it ought to be known.

Mr. JOHNSON. If there are any traveling expenses paid they are actual traveling expenses.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is a very great item.

Mr. JOHNSON. My impression is they are not allowed anything.

Mr. HENDERSON. My impression is that they were always paid their actual traveling expenses and something more, so much a mile for the actual amount of travel. It seems to me highly important that we should know in reference to this matter if traveling expenses are paid. My impression is that this is a sufficient compensation, and I shall vote against the increase. I shall vote against it from a very general principle which actuates me in this matter. I do not know that any very great demand has been made on Congress to increase the compensation of these clerks. We are increasing the compensation of almost every officer connected with the Army, and of privates. Against the latter I make no complaint; but wherever an opportunity is presented of making a new office we make it and give it emolument and compensation that, it seems to me, we ought to avoid with the finances of the Government in their present condition. We are increasing compensations to such an extent that if carried on for another year at the same rate, (and it may be that we shall not get through with this war in another year,) I fear that our finances will break down under the load that we are imposing on them, and in my judgment it is just as important to guard against a failure of finances as to guard against a failure of our troops in the field; and certainly we are legislating somewhat recklessly here day after day in reference to every important point. We cannot expect to carry on this war after our condition is such that we cannot borrow money any longer to conduct it. We must rely upon loans in order to conduct it, because it cannot be expected that the people can bear the taxation from year to year necessary to raise $1,000,000,000. When once we have broken down the credit of the Government, (and we cannot do it more successfully than by increasing salaries in every shape and form,) we cannot expect then to make loans to carry it on. It really seems to me that we are pursuing rather a reckless course, such a course as an individual would likely pursue if he had made up his mind that he did not intend to pay his debts. We are acting with a degree of extravagance in increasing pay where it has not been asked. I have never been aware that paymasters' clerks have made any representation to Congress on this subject. Have they done so?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe everybody else has done so too; and if we sit here and listen to complaints of this character we shall have nothing else to do but to increase compensation. Everybody desires an increase of his compensation, of course; but there is a point beyond which we ought not to go; and every man who feels any interest in preserving the credit and the character of the Government in times when we need credit, I think should begin to look to upholding and preserving it and to gathering up the ends wherever we can. In that view of the subject I have voted continually against all these measures which, though not so intended, will have the effect of crippling the finances of the Government, and I shall continue to vote against them.

It has been suggested that gentlemen of high integrity ought to be employed in places of this sort. I grant that; but take the young men who have had charge of the finances perhaps of large mercantile firms in this country for the last five or six or ten years, men of undoubted integrity, men of probity, men of character, who have sought places of this sort; and what sort of compensation had they been receiving before the war? Not exceeding $500 or $600 a year. Such men could be employed at fifty dollars per month, men of tried honesty, of tried capacity, of integrity, and fidelity. We all know that fact. Since the war commenced, they are getting here $1,000 a year, and we propose to increase it to $1,200; and Senators tell us that is not enough. I know that men who could have been employed before the war commenced for $300 or $400 or $500 a year ought to have more now in consequence of the condition of the currency than they had then; but men who were employed at the price that I have stated have sought these places at $700 a year with a ration a day, making it $970, as I understand. Men have been found all over the country to seek these places at that salary, and have been able to give the bonds required, men of tried capacity and tried integrity. I do not see any necessity for increasing the pay. I would not throw anything in the way of a fair and just compensation to these young men; they deserve it; but we ought to begin to look at a very early day to the result, the consequences upon our condition of this reckless sort of legislation.

I see no reason for increasing the compensation unless we fail to get the right sort of men. If the compensation heretofore has failed to get men of capacity and integrity, we ought to increase it; but I have heard no complaint of that character. I suppose that there is no difficulty on the part of paymasters in acquiring the right material for clerks. I have not heard so, and until some Senator tells me that there is a difficulty in getting the right material, I shall be unwilling to support such an increase of compensation as is now proposed. Here is a large increase, an increase of $300 beyond what they have enjoyed heretofore, and yet I do not hear that there is any difficulty in procuring clerks. Then why the necessity of the increase at all? I have heard no want of integrity charged against these clerks. I have not heard that they have injured the Government by purloining the funds belonging to the paymasters. If so, I presume the paymasters' bonds have been sufficiently good. If paymasters have been able to get good men, why increase the compensation? If good men can be obtained at present prices, why increase them? Why increase them unless we want to bring down the credit of the Government? I shall vote against all such propositions.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It is a little singular that we should not be able to ascertain whether these paymasters' clerks have their traveling expenses paid or not. Not having any charge of matters of this kind, I am unable to say how the fact is; but by reference to the official Register I see a statement of what they do receive; and it is as follows:

"Paymasters' clerks, in addition to the $700 per annum, are entitled, under the fifth section of the act of August 31, 1852, to one ration per day, commuted at seventy-five cents when on duty at their station."

There is nothing said upon the subject of traveling expenses; and I presume the fact is, although I do not know it to be so, that they generally are furnished with transportation by the quartermaster's department, as the paymasters themselves are, as a general rule, when being transferred from one section of the country to another. I think that is likely to be the state of the case, although I do not know it; and it is not unreasonable that I should be in ignorance of it when the mind of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is uncertain as to the fact. The allowance, as stated in the official Register, amounts to about the sum stated by the Senator from Massachusetts. The proposition of the House of Representatives is to increase the salary to $1,200, and to leave them the ration commuted at seventy-five cents per day; and that the Senator from Missouri characterizes as reckless legislation, which is to produce ruin and bring us to bankruptcy. If we are near national bankruptcy as that, I apprehend this will not have the effect of making the disease any more fatal, though I know it is the last feather that breaks the camel's back. I consider this an important matter to a certain extent.

The Senator from Missouri says we have had no difficulty in acquiring the services of valuable and efficient persons in this branch of duty. I grant you we have had no difficulty in filling up these appointments, as we have had no difficulty in filling up every civil and military appointment in the public service. There always are scores and hundreds of persons who, by reason of embarrassments at home, failures in business, and more particularly a desire to get into the public service, press forward to fill these places; and after they get in and have experience of the duties they are called upon to perform and the pay and rations received, scores of them are just as anxious to go out as they were to get in originally. I know individuals, competent men, who have resigned their clerkships to paymasters, on the ground that the salary would not maintain them in the service, and I know that there are now numbers of them awaiting the action of the present Congress to determine whether they remain in the service or not. I have no doubt you can fill up all these places; but I fear it will be by an inferior class of men, and that the public will sustain detriment and injury in consequence of this change.

I have no particular feeling about it further than the facts have come to my mind incidentally by the conversation of persons who are interested in these appointments. It will be perfectly satisfactory to me whether the amendment prevails or fails. I know that we have increased salaries, and the salaries of men high in command, and increased them in a very great ratio, to the amount of thousands; and I do not know why the necessary increase of salary should not be extended to the efficient, worthy men who are occupying inferior stations, and yet who are performing most valuable and important services to the Government. This is the way it strikes me, and this is the reason that controls my action in this matter.

Mr. HALE. I remember, sir, about two months ago I guess it was, a bill was reported by the Naval Committee to increase the pay of the clerks of paymasters in the Navy, which is very low indeed, not more than half the pay of the paymasters' clerks in the Army, and the Senate had a fit of economy, and finally voted that they would not raise it, that they must remain as they were. The Navy Department thought it was impossible to get along under the then existing state of things, and for the purpose of having a few competent persons in these places they recommended a bill which was reported to the Senate and finally passed, by which the pay of some few of them was raised, and paymasters of vessels having a complement of less I think than one hundred and seventy-five men were left without any clerks. The Senate actually refused to raise the salaries of paymasters' clerks in the Navy when they were not half what they were in the Army. As Congress was so economical in that respect, I think they had better adhere to it still, and as they would not do anything for paymasters' clerks in the Navy, let the paymasters' clerks in the Army stand as they are.

Mr. WILKINSON. I think the Senator from New Hampshire advocated the proposition which was rejected, to increase the pay of the paymasters' clerks in the Navy.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir, but, as I advocated it, the highest would not be equal to a paymaster's clerk in the Army.

Mr. WILKINSON. They do not have as much business to do. If the Senate did wrong the other day, that is no reason why it should not do right now. I believe there is no class of clerks under the grade of fourth-class clerks in the Departments, who draw $1,800 a year; that have such important duties to perform as these paymasters' clerks in the Army. It is a fact that many honest and capable paymasters at the commencement of this war, when they entered upon their duties, lost more than their entire pay by the mistakes and difficulties they had to encounter in ascertaining their duties. I think everybody who understands this business will agree with me that the duties of a paymaster are the most difficult duties that almost any of our Army officers have to perform, and unless his clerk is a very correct and careful officer the paymaster will be very likely to make such mistakes as to involve his securities. I do not know of any class of persons who should be more careful and more efficient and require more ability than the persons now under consideration. Look at the first-class clerkships in this city. Some of those who do mere clerical duty, nothing but the plainest and simplest copying, receive $1,200 a year. A paymaster goes out to the Army with eighty or ninety thousand dollars. A perplexing question may arise in regard to almost every man whom he pays, whether he should be paid twenty dollars bounty or fifty dollars bounty, and so on. If the least mistake is made, a mistake of a very trifling sum for each individual would amount to a great deal in the aggregate. I think, myself, that $1,400 a year is a very reasonable compensation; and considering that these parties are disbursing millions upon millions and hundreds of millions of dollars of Government money, I think we should pay enough to secure the services of the best business men we can get.

Mr. GRIMES. I think I can settle one of the questions that have been raised, and that is as to the payment of the expenses of transportation of these clerks. The act of April 24, 1816, was the first act of Congress that mentioned paymasters' clerks. By that act it was provided "That regimental and battalion paymasters shall receive the pay and emoluments of major, and shall each be allowed a capable non-commissioned officer as clerk, who, while so employed, shall receive double pay and the actual expense of transportation while traveling under orders in the discharge of his duty."

That was the basis of all the laws adopted by Congress in relation to paymasters' clerks, and that portion of it which says that the clerk shall receive the actual expense of transportation while traveling under orders in the discharge of his duties stands unrepealed.

Then the act of July 5, 1838, declared

"That whenever suitable non-commissioned officers or privates cannot be procured from the line of the Army to serve as paymasters' clerks, paymasters be, and are hereby, authorized and empowered, by and with the approbation of the Secretary of War, to employ citizens to perform that duty, at salaries not to exceed $500 per annum."

There is a note in Brightly's Digest to this section which says: "This section relates to clerks of paymasters paying the regular Army, and not to the paying of militia and volunteers;" and a reference is made to the fourth volume of Opinions of the Attorneys General, page 94.

It would seem from this that this institution of paymasters' clerks has grown up from a very small beginning; that instead of taking a non-commissioned officer or private as we did a few years ago and doubling his pay as a non-commissioned officer or private, we have now got so as to pay these clerks already $970 a year, and it is proposed to increase that salary to $1,470. A comparison has been drawn between the services that they are compelled to render and our clerks here in the Treasury and other Departments. Every man forms his own judgment as to the relative merits of these different aspirants for pecuniary favors at our hands, and as to the kind of responsibility that each of them is compelled to bear, and the duties that he is compelled to perform; but I must confess that if I had my choice to be a paymaster's clerk at $1,470, or a clerk in one of the Departments in this city at $1,800 a year, I should infinitely prefer being a paymaster's clerk at $1,470, having transportation wherever I might be ordered to go, living at the public expense as they do on the transport vessels upon which they are ordered. What are the great responsibilities that they are compelled to undergo? Our rule is that the responsibility rests upon the paymaster, and originally he was the man who made out all the muster-rolls, paid all the money, and it is only a recent thing that he has been allowed a clerk; and now, forsooth, it is said that this infinite amount of responsibility, which has been supposed to rest upon the paymaster rests upon his clerk. I do not look at it in that light. I look at it a good deal as the Senator from Missouri does. I am willing to pay these clerks a reasonable compensation; I am willing to pay them what I believe their services are fairly worth. I know that just as competent men as are employed by any of these paymasters can be procured at the rate which the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has proposed to give them, and are being employed now by paymasters. Why at this particular moment, when our finances are in the condition that they are said to be in, whenever an opportunity is presented to increase the salary of an officer, we should immediately avail ourselves of it and raise his salary, I do not see.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that if the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs be adopted it will make the increase of the compensation of these officers about two hundred and thirty dollars a year. If it is not adopted, the increase will be $500 a year. I cannot say what the House of Representatives intended in passing the bill, nor what the Committee on Military Affairs in the House of Representatives intended when they reported the bill; but the chairman of the committee in advocating it stated that they proposed to put these clerks on the same footing as first-class clerks, and the inference is that they expected to pay these men $1,200 a year, and that that should be the whole of it.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that as the law has stood heretofore the compensation of these clerks was about nine hundred dollars.

Mr. GRIMES. Nine hundred and seventy-five dollars.

Mr. MORRILL. Possibly it was a fraction over. This bill increases it to $1,200, and that is the pay of a first-class clerk, the lowest class, in one of your Departments; and that is the smallest pay of all your subordinate officers. I believe most of the Capitol police about here get from twelve to fourteen hundred dollars. If you reject this amendment and give them their rations the pay will amount to about fourteen hundred and seventy-five dollars, which is a little more than the pay of a second-class clerk in the Departments. I should say on comparison that that was not unfair or unreasonable. If this thing is to go by comparison, and the duties of these clerks compare with the duties which are devolved on the young gentlemen who are employed in these Departments, certainly the pay contemplated by the amendment is too large. It is that of a second-class clerk. I do not think anybody will doubt that the duties devolved on the young gentlemen in this position are certainly equal to those of a second-class clerk in the Departments.

I think I ought to state this fact communicated to me yesterday by one of these clerks: it has obtained as a general practice by the paymasters heretofore to make the salary of these young gentlemen equal to that of first-class clerks. I am informed that most of the paymasters, in order to retain these clerks in their employment, have been in the habit of paying them the difference between the compensation allowed by law—which is a little over nine hundred dollars: the Senator from Iowa says $975—and $1,200, the compensation allowed to first-class clerks in the Departments. If the compensation of a paymaster was only just before, it is not exactly fair for us to impose upon him the burden of paying that additional compensation to his clerk. I do not judge of that. I have no means of judging of it. On the whole, considering the fact that the clerk of the paymaster is taken abroad, is liable to be sent on duty anywhere, and must of course be subjected to extraordinary expenses oftentimes, I do not think it unreasonable that he should have the pay of a second-class clerk; and I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to have the question before the Senate stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs to amend the fourth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives by adding the words, "without rations;" so that the section, if amended, will read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the pay of clerks of paymasters in the Army of the United States shall be $1,200 per annum without rations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the sixth section of the House amendment, in the following words:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the first section of this act shall terminate and expire at the end of the present rebellion.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the seventh section of the amendment of the House by striking out the word "bill" and inserting "act." It now reads "provisions of this bill;" it should read "provisions of this act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to reconsider the amendment of the committee which was adopted as section six. It is as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That when the rank, pay, and emoluments of any officer are declared by law to be those of a specified military grade, he shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of that grade, and no more, any previous law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

I wish to say that that amendment was intended to reach a particular case which I think ought to be corrected by legislation. It was framed upon some letters of correspondence between the Second Comptroller of the Treasury and some of the officials of the War Department in which the Treasury construction was overruled. I think we ought to have some legislation to correct such a case; but I am told that by a certain decision in the paymaster's department this amendment will be construed to reach cases that the committee did not intend and which I think ought not to be disturbed; that it will reach the fuel and quarters allowed to officers and will touch the allowances to generals commanding departments or officers commanding particular posts under the act of 1847. If that be the case, I think we had better reconsider it and not press it on this bill. Then we can take the subject up, and before the adjournment of Congress, I think, we can frame a measure that will do precisely what we intend without doing injustice to anybody or disturbing the existing relations. I therefore move to reconsider this amendment, in the hope that if it should be reconsidered we shall then reject it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to what I understand will be the construction of that section, if it is permitted to remain in the bill, by the pay department. I heard this morning that the Paymaster General is of opinion that if this particular section should become a law it will take from all those officers the allowances for fuel, rations, &c. I do not see exactly how that could be so, but that I am told is the construction put upon it by the Department. I was convinced before I mentioned the subject to the chairman of the committee that that was not his purpose nor the purpose of the committee. I understand the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is to reconsider with a view to reject this amendment and provide for it afterwards.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that it must be a very strange state of things that requires this section to be reconsidered and rejected, and a very strange state of things that required it to be enacted. It is in these words:

That when the rank, pay, and emoluments of any officer are declared by law to be those of a specified military grade, he shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of that grade, and no more, any previous law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

That is simply saying that when the law says his compensation shall be so much it shall be that and no more.

Mr. COLLAMER. It implies that they get more than they are entitled to.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; it implies that they are in the habit of getting more than the law gives them, and that they are desirous of having that license continued. I hope the Senate will not continue it. If there is any such practice as that this provision is wanted, eminently wanted.

Mr. CONNESS. I may as well state that the object and purpose comprehended here was not that it should reach every officer of certain grades, but that it should reach one or more cases where abuses are supposed to exist. As stated by the honorable Senator from Maryland, if this section should be adopted it will receive a construction that will be unjust to a great many officers who have been receiving more than they were entitled to, and I hope the reconsideration will take place.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the case sought to be corrected grew out of this construction: by the act of 1847 the Adjutant General was allowed double rations; and the act creating the office of Adjutant General provides that he shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general. The Adjutant General, by the practice of the Department, now draws twenty-seven rations a day, three rations for servants and twenty-four for himself. He would draw twelve rations if the latter construction prevailed. But this same law of 1847 allows double rations to generals commanding in the field, generals commanding departments, and officers commanding separate posts. The committee believe that to be proper. It was made for the purpose of meeting certain expenses, and we thought it had better not be disturbed in the present condition of the war; but we wanted to correct a construction here. It is said, however, by persons in whose judgment I have great confidence, that the construction of this section by the pay department would rule out fuel and quarters. I do not believe it. I do not believe it would be a fair construction of the section if it should be passed; but if there is any possibility of it I do not think we ought to disturb it. I simply propose to reconsider this amendment, as it is possible this construction may be put upon it, and take up the matter anew, and in some other measure report the proposition in such a form as will correct abuses, and at the same time not disturb what is a fair construction of the present law and the settled policy of the Government—settled for good reasons.

Mr. HALE. I shall not insist on this, but I want to call the attention of the Senate to this case as an illustration of this vicious mode of paying salaries. We do not know what we are paying, and we do not know what is to be paid by it, and we do not know what construction is to be put upon it, and some of these allowances are subject to be increased or diminished by a regulation of the Department. I hope the Senate will look into it, and I hope that every officer that can be paid by a fixed salary will be so paid, and that this mode of paying by rank and emoluments, so that we do not know what we give, nor how much we give, nor what it will be to-morrow, nor what it is to-day, will be abandoned in every case where it is possible to abandon it. Let us illustrate the wisdom of the Senate in adopting this new rule to the Judge Advocate General and his assistant, who are to be created by this bill. But still I cannot see any reason for reconsidering this section, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. GRIMES. In the hope that there may be such a construction given to this section as the Senator from Maryland has indicated, I shall vote against striking it out, because I believe there is not an officer of the Army serving in Washington or anywhere else, except it be in the field, who is not receiving by his pay proper, his rations, and his forage as much as he is entitled to receive and a great deal more than is paid in any other branch of the public service for any such corresponding duties. I understand the Senator from Maryland says that the construction placed upon this section at the pay department is that it will strike off the commutation for fuel and quarters. Of course it cannot strike off the pay proper, or the rations, or the allowance for servants or forage. I hold in my hand a report made by the Secretary of War in 1858, (and it is a report which is required to be made by the Secretary of War periodically,) giving the pay of every Army officer for his commutation and emoluments of various descriptions and kinds in the preceding year, 1857. By that report it will be observed that the pay proper, rations, and commutation for servants and forage of a brigadier general stationed here in Washington, without any allowance for quarters or fuel, amounted to $5,133 60. Add to this the amount which, under a special order of the present Secretary of War, issued last autumn, is allowed to a brigadier general in this city for commutation for quarters and fuel, $1,360, and you have the nice little sum of $6,493 60 for a brigadier general performing bureau duty here in Washington.

Mr. WILSON. Give us the items.

Mr. GRIMES. I can give the items. The items are all here in this public record, printed by order of the House of Representatives. I am giving the pay of Brigadier General Thomas S. Jesup. He was the chief quartermaster of the Army of the United States, and was stationed here in Washington. His pay proper amounted to $1,488; his rations, $2,622; his allowance for servants, $814 50; and his forage, $209 10; making a sum total of $5,133 60. I am not reading the commutation for fuel and quarters, which the Senator from Maryland says, according to the construction which will be given to this section at the pay department, will be stricken off by the adoption of this proposition. If I did include the commutation for fuel and quarters it would be found that General Jesup while doing bureau duty here in Washington that year under the rule that was then established, not the rule that is established to-day in Washington, received $235 50 for fuel, and $480 60 for quarters, making the total amount that he received that year $5,849 70. I only allude to this to show what was the pay of a brigadier general performing duty here in Washington at that time.

If any Senator will take the trouble to send for this document and look through it, and see the average pay that was paid to the colonels and lieutenant colonels and majors, in all the bureaus where they were established here, he will find that the pay was greatly in excess of the pay in any other branch of the public service, leaving off the commutation for fuel and quarters. As an illustration, in 1857 the pay of the Paymaster General was $3,616, saying nothing about his commutation for fuel and quarters. When that was added, his pay was $4,230 83. Adding to the $3,616, his pay without commutation of fuel and quarters, the amount that he is authorized to receive under the recent order of the present Secretary of War, which is $1,360, and he would receive $4,976. It will be observed that the average pay of majors, without commutation for fuel and quarters, without transportation of baggage, and without traveling expenses, is $2,600. How do you pay your officers in the Navy of corresponding grade? Why, sir, you pay them $2,343, while you pay to a man of corresponding grade in the Army $3,700. You require an officer of the Navy to come here to do duty in one of the bureaus of the Department, and he is compelled to support his family here and perform precisely the same character of duties that are performed by a military officer over the way, and you give to the military officer, who performs no more arduous or responsible duties, some $1,400 a year more than you give to the naval officer. Is that just? Is that equitable? Are we doing justice to ourselves in permitting such distinctions as that to exist?

Then look at the civil branch of the public service, and compare the pay you give to these bureau officers in the Army stationed here with the pay given to the chiefs of your different civil bureaus. Is there anybody who pretends to say that the young majors in the War Department perform as arduous duties as are performed by your Second Auditors, or your Third or your Fourth or your Fifth or Sixth Auditors, or as are performed by the chiefs of your bureaus in the Post Office Department, or by your Assistant Attorney General? And yet you pay to those military officers several hundred dollars more than you pay to the chiefs of these respective bureaus. Is that just to ourselves? Is it just to the men who are in the front, the men who have gone down to peril their lives for us, and who are drawing less pay than the men who are performing bureau duty here in Washington by from one thousand to fifteen hundred dollars a year? No wonder, sir, that there should be an immense effort made by Army officers to be assigned to bureau duty. They are not only free from responsibility, they are not only free from the risk of life and limb, but you pay them from one thousand to fifteen hundred dollars a year more than you pay to the men of the corresponding grade who are risking their lives and their limbs for the defense of the country.

Mr. President, I agree fully with the Senator from New Hampshire that this is a great abuse and ought to be corrected, and I shall stand with him and with any other Senator in trying to strike it down on every opportunity that may occur. Here is one of the opportunities, and I propose to vote for it.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Iowa is certainly mistaken in the estimates he has made, and I tell him very plainly how he is mistaken. He has taken the case of General Jesup, who served the country nearly half a century, and whose pay was very large for the reason that he received additional pay for the number of years he had served the country; but that is not a fair estimate by which to measure others. Now I will take the office of a brigadier general. It is very plain what he gets in Washington or out of Washington. A brigadier general receives $124 a month as pay, whether he is in the front or in Washington. He receives twelve rations per day, whether he is in Washington or at the front.

Mr. JOHNSON. What are they commuted at?

Mr. WILSON. They are commuted at $108. He has three servants. The commutation price of the servants is $67 50, making his total pay $299 50 per month. He is entitled to draw forage for four horses if he keeps them. They are not commuted in the field or in Washington. Up to this point, therefore, the pay of a general in the field, a colonel, a lieutenant colonel, a major, or any other officer, is the same as it is in this city. The Government in this city allows fuel and quarters. The fuel for a colonel, from the 1st of May to the last day of September, five months, is one cord of wood, and from the 1st of October to the 30th of April three and a half cords of wood.

Mr. JOHNSON. For the whole time.

Mr. WILSON. For the whole season, which would be about thirty cords of wood. We will call it $300. I understand the commutation is nine dollars a cord.

Mr. GRIMES. No; ten dollars.

Mr. WILSON. It is stated here to be ten dollars, but I was told that it was nine dollars. That would be $270; but we will say they commute it at ten dollars; that is $300. Then they are entitled to quarters, four rooms at eighteen dollars, seventy-two dollars. A brigadier general is allowed five rooms, making ninety dollars a month. We will say in round numbers that the pay of a general officer is $300 a month, besides the forage, fuel, and quarters. I will take a general as an illustration. He gets $299 50 per month. He is entitled to forage for four horses, which he cannot commute; he must draw it in kind. Then he is entitled to ninety dollars a month for rooms, which would be $1,080, and about two hundred and seventy dollars, we will say $300, in round numbers, making $1,400. Then including the cost of the forage for four horses, which he must draw in kind, I make the whole amount received by a brigadier general $5,352.

Mr. JOHNSON. What does a colonel receive?

Mr. WILSON. A colonel receives $3,892, say $3,900, in round numbers. The mistake the Senator from Iowa makes is in taking as an example the case of an officer like General Jesup, who served the country so long, and therefore his pay was much larger than a general officer of but a few years' standing. It is only after officers, whether generals, colonels, or majors, have served a great many years that they are entitled to draw so much in addition in rations. The Senator's basis of calculation is not correct. The pay is about thirty-nine hundred dollars for a colonel and about fifty-three hundred dollars for a brigadier general, if they have no service rations.

Mr. GRIMES. It would be very easy for us all to be relieved from any difficulty in finding out what were the true facts in this case if the Secretary of War would comply with the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted June 14, 1848, which is a permanent resolution, and send to us the Army Register as it was sent in 1858 and 1861, a copy of each of which I have in my hands, and which contain the exact amount of pay that every Army officer has received during the preceding year; but unfortunately we have not got that.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is it not in the Blue Book?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir. This is the Army Register, containing the pay of every description of officer of the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not in the Blue Book just out?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir. Nothing of the kind was ever published in the Blue Book.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it is stated to be in this Blue Book.

Mr. GRIMES. This information has never been published in the Blue Book. This is a special report made under a standing resolution of the House of Representatives, and made to that House periodically. I stated that, under the construction of the law as we now have it, the officers who are performing clerical duty, civil duty, at Washington and elsewhere are paid greatly in excess of those in the field. Does the Senator from Massachusetts deny it?

Mr. WILSON. They receive commutation for fuel and quarters.

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly a man performing duties here as a brigadier general or a colonel, incurring no responsibility and no risk, gets $1,360 more than the officer of the same rank who is fighting down near Spottsylvania Court-House. A major performing duties here gets $1,134 and a captain $868 02 more than a major or a captain gets down there. Is that just? That is the point I make.

Mr. CONNESS. I think in his desire to economize, and to state his case strongly, the Senator from Iowa, perhaps unconsciously, does some injustice to what he terms "bureau officers." I do not know any one class of men connected with the Government who are worked so hard as the bureau officers in the War Department. They are at work by day and by night. They are at work, whether it be proper or not, on the Sabbath, as well as on every day of the week. While I am not disposed to enter into this discussion to the extent of making a comparison of figures, it certainly is clear that if there be too much pay to the officers of the Army by the construction of the laws as they now stand, the only proper mode in seeking a remedy is to attempt an entire reorganization. It is very easy to see what injustice may be done by these spasmodic attempts at economy, aiming at particular officers, one now and another again. I hope this course will not be taken. I will vote with the Senator from Iowa, or with the Committee on Military Affairs, whenever they make a showing which shall convince the Senate that the officers of the Army are receiving larger compensation than they reasonably should; but I hope that we shall wait and take the subject up in that manner, and give it the attention that it requires. This seeking to strike down the compensation of a particular officer whenever a bill is before the Senate which admits of it seems to me, certainly, not the legitimate and proper way. I hope that the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the committee, will be carried, and that we shall go on with this work.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that if no fuel and quarters were allowed in this city there is not an officer engaged here who could stay here.

Mr. GRIMES. We have officers in the Navy Department performing precisely the same duty and with just as high a corresponding rank, who have been performing and are to-day performing similar duty, and expect to remain here, and I do not know of any reason why their family and personal expenses are not as great as those of officers of the Army. The same is true of officers in the civil service in this city.

Mr. WILSON. Take, for instance, Colonel Townsend or Colonel Harding or Major Vincent. If you were to reduce them down in this way it would be almost impossible for them to remain here. I hope, therefore, under the circumstances, we shall reconsider this amendment if the construction is put upon it that fuel and quarters are not to be allowed them, and that we shall hereafter take up the matter and carefully consider it, and classify the whole thing deliberately and carefully; because certainly if this amendment shall be adopted and that construction is put upon it, it is undoubtedly contrary to what the Committee on Military Affairs understood they were doing. I do not believe that would be a fair construction of it; but I do not want to run any risk about it. In addition to that, I think this is no time for us to take from General Meade or General Butler or General Sherman or any of the generals commanding in the field or any of the officers in front of the enemy the additional rations that they were allowed under the law of 1847. If this construction would reach those cases I do not want to reach them. I did want to reach a case where to do so would be wrong. I hope before the close of the session to prepare a measure that will correct what I consider to be wrong; but I certainly do not want to inflict any wrong on our officers in Washington or in the front of the enemy.

Mr. GRIMES. Nobody has said, nobody has intimated that the construction which the Senator from Maryland says is put upon this section at the pay department affected General Meade or General Butler. It only relates to the commutation for fuel and quarters, not to the rations or servants or forage.

The Senator has referred to Colonel Townsend. What is Colonel Townsend's pay? Four years ago, when Colonel Townsend was only a major, his pay, without the commutation for quarters and fuel, was $2,694. Now he is a colonel. He gets paid according to the ascending scale of his rank, and he gets a corresponding amount of pay, and his salary to-day, with the commutation of quarters and so on, would amount to some thirty-six or thirty-seven hundred dollars. Is not that enough? You do not pay your Comptrollers or your Auditors more than that, do you? Why should you pay the man who performs clerical duty in the War Department more? I want to do them complete justice; but I do not want to pay him who is a colonel here in the War Department more than I pay a colonel down in the front.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Richardson, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Hale, Henderson, Howe, Powell, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Fessenden, Harding, Harlan, Hicks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wright—17.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee, to insert as section six the following:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That when the rank, pay, and emoluments of any officer are declared by law to be those of a specified military grade, he shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of that grade, and no more, any previous law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I have an amendment to offer to the first section of the committee's report. I do not know whether it will be in order now, as we have passed it without reconsidering it.

Mr. FOOT. When the question was first presented to the Senate upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs to the amendment of the House of Representatives, the Senator from Kentucky, myself then being in the chair for the time being, offered an amendment to the amendment of the committee. The Chair not being apprised of the extent and nature of the House amendment, regarded it as an ordinary amendment in part to the Senate bill, and that the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was an amendment to the amendment of the House, and was in the second degree, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, being in the third degree, was not then in order. He withheld his amendment and the amendment of the committee was concurred in. Upon examination, however, subsequently, my own attention having been called to the question, I find that the amendment of the House is in the nature of an entire substitution for the original Senate bill, and in such cases by the parliamentary law the amendment of the House is treated as a part of the original text, that being the only text of the original bill to which the amending House have agreed; so that when it comes back to the originating House it is to be treated as an original bill, in other words as the text of the bill, and not merely in the nature of an amendment. Therefore, when an amendment is offered either through a committee or by an individual to this amendment or substitution of the amending House, it is treated as an amendment in the first degree, treating the substitution or the amendment in the form of a substitution of the amending House as the original bill, as the text itself. In that view of it, and by the parliamentary law, as the Chair will find by reference to it, the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky at the time was in order, being in the second degree, an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs, theirs being an amendment in the first degree in a case of this kind where the amending House offer an entire substitute for the original bill of the originating House. That being the case, and the Senator, by misapprehension of the Chair at the time, withdrawing his proposition as out of order, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendment of the committee to the first section of the House amendment, in order that the Senator from Kentucky may have the opportunity—which is his right, and which was overruled as out of order by the Chair through a misapprehension on my part then occupying the chair—to offer his amendment. I move to reconsider the vote for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I now move to strike out the first amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, and to insert in lieu thereof:

That from and after the 1st day of May, 1864, the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates in the regular Army and volunteers and drafted forces in the service of the United States shall be paid in gold: Provided, That said officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates may be paid in Treasury notes or paper money when the Government cannot pay in gold. If not paid in gold, they shall be paid in paper an amount equal to the value of gold at the time of payment.

Mr. President, it is very evident that in consequence of the depreciation of paper money in which we pay the soldiers their pay should be increased. There is a great deal of difficulty in fixing the amount that they should receive, in consequence of not knowing what will be the value of this paper money in which they are to be paid in the future. The pay of the Army as at present regulated by law was fixed before there was any depreciation in the currency. I think the only just mode by which we can remedy the evil is to pay them in gold or its equivalent.

If we pass the amendment proposed by the committee, increasing the pay, which increase is certainly proper, it may be that in four months from this time this paper money may be worth greatly less than it is now. It may be at one hundred or one hundred and fifty or two hundred per cent. discount. If that should unfortunately be the result, the soldiers would not be properly paid; they would not get enough. It may possibly be that at the end of five months this paper money may be something near par compared with gold. If that should be the case, the pay would be too great. The only mode by which we can, with the fluctuations of this paper money, pass a law to pay the soldiers in the field equitably and justly is to measure their pay by the gold standard. The pay of the Army before the fluctuations of the currency, I suppose, was fixed about right. I take that for granted. Then we should continue to pay those men who are periling their lives in the field either in coin or an amount of paper money that is equivalent to it in value.

Under the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs you pay some of the soldiers sixteen dollars a month, and others, I believe, eighteen dollars. That is not quite as much pay as they had before the depreciation of the currency. But suppose you pass that, and this paper money should depreciate in a few months fifty per cent., the pay then would be greatly too small. If, on the other hand, the paper money were to improve greatly in value and come up to something like par—a thing that I do not expect unless you decrease the issue of this paper money, indeed I know we shall not witness it unless the paper issues are decreased—then that will be paying them too high. In order to do exact justice to those men, I think we should either pay them in gold or its equivalent. I am fully aware that we are not in a condition to pay gold, and I provide for that. Under this amendment, if the Government cannot pay in gold, they can pay in greenbacks or paper money, but they must pay an amount equivalent to the gold which we covenanted to pay in the beginning. I have given this matter very mature reflection. I am in favor of increasing the pay of the soldiers, and I do not think the increase proposed by the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs is any too great. But, sir, you may pass this bill to-day and perhaps to-morrow their pay may be greatly less than it is to-day in consequence of the depreciation of the currency. I think we should fix some mode of paying these men that would give them certain values on the day of payment. In my judgment there is no other equitable way in which we can pay them than the one I propose. The amendment is clear and distinct and simple, and I hope it will be adopted. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. WILEY] is necessarily absent from the city.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 6, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Powell, and Richardson—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Fessenden, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howard, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wright—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I move to insert at the end of the first section of the committee's amendments the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to colored soldiers.

It is not my purpose to make a speech on this amendment. I think the whole country ought to be satisfied that those negro soldiers are not equal in value to white men. I know there are some Senators who think that perhaps a white man is nearly as good as a negro if he will behave himself. I am not one of those who think so. I think the Anglo-Saxon blood is better on any field than any negro that ever was born. I do not see that they have done much in this war. I believe those who marched through this city the other day were put in the rear of the Army and have not been sent to the front in the terrible battles we have had, in which the soldiers of our own race have exhibited the greatest valor. No people ever fought better than the armies that have been fighting in the front lately. All the reports I get from the Mississippi valley are that these negroes are exceedingly worthless, that they do but little except at rations. I do not think they ought to be paid as much as white soldiers. I do not think they are worth as much, and consequently I do not wish to have the provisions of this bill increasing the pay of the Army—for I am in favor of increasing the pay of the white soldiers—apply to that worthless class of soldiers. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Powell, and Richardson—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Fessenden, Hale, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wright—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) The question is on the bill as amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is the question now on the passage of the bill?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the bill as amended. The Senate originated the bill; it came back from the House of Representatives with a substitute; that substitute has been amended, and the question now is on the substitute as thus amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to say that I shall support the bill, though I do not agree with some of its provisions. In the first place I am not content cheerfully to vote an increase of pay to the negro troops. I believe honestly that every million of dollars that is paid away of the people's money to support negro troops in the field is so much money lost, and that the people to that extent are unnecessarily, wrongfully taxed. I believe that this bill also does not provide that compensation for the soldiers that they ought to receive. While the currency has depreciated in value, the expenses of living to the soldiers have largely increased. I think that their compensation ought to be near twenty dollars per month to make it what in the first place the Government agreed they should have; but on several occasions the question has been fairly tested in the Senate, and it is now found that it is impossible to carry more than sixteen dollars per month. I think this is a very insufficient, inadequate increase of their pay; but as it is all that can be secured to them, as it is the best we can do, I shall vote for the bill.

The substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

BRANCH MINT AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. CONNESS. I submit a motion that the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. No. 176) authorizing the erection of buildings for the branch mint at San Francisco, passed some days since. I find that there was an error in the engrossment. The bill made an appropriation of $300,000; but it has found its way to the House with an appropriation of $3,000. The committee of the House suggest that it be withdrawn from there, and the engrossment corrected. I make this motion with that view.

The motion was agreed to.

A message was subsequently received from the House of Representatives returning to the Senate, agreeably to its request, the bill (S. No. 176) authorizing the erection of buildings for the branch mint at San Francisco.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 265) to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the amendment of the Committee on Printing is a substitute for the entire bill, perhaps it will only be necessary to read the substitute.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The original bill will not be read unless some Senator desires to hear it. The substitute will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

That hereafter, instead of furnishing manuscript copies of the documents usually accompanying their annual reports to each House of Congress, or to the Superintendent of Public Printing, the heads of the several Departments of Government shall transmit them, on or before the 1st day of November in each year, to the Joint Committee of Congress on Public Printing; and that it shall be the duty of that joint committee to appoint some competent person, who shall edit and select such portions of the documents so placed in their hands as shall, in the judgment of the committee, be desirable for popular distribution, and to prepare an index to the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the heads of the several Departments of Government to furnish the Superintendent of Public Printing with copies of their respective reports on or before the third Monday in November in each year.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of Public Printing to print the President's message, the reports of the heads of Departments, and the abridgment of accompanying documents prepared under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, suitably bound; and that, in addition to the number now required by law, and unless otherwise ordered by either House of Congress, it shall be his duty to print ten thousand copies of the same for the use of the Senate, and twenty-five thousand copies for the use of the House, and to deliver the same to the proper officer of each House, respectively, on or before the third Wednesday in December following the assembling of Congress, or as soon thereafter as practicable. And further, it shall also be the duty of the said Superintendent to cause to be printed and stitched in paper covers twenty-five hundred copies of the annual reports of the Executive Departments for the use of said Departments, respectively, and also one thousand copies of the reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, Commissioner of Pensions, Commissioner of the Internal Revenue, and such number of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to be bound, not exceeding three thousand copies, as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior, for their use, respectively; and also five hundred copies of the reports of the superintendent of the Washington aqueduct, architect of the Capitol extension, Metropolitan Police Board, Third Auditor of the Treasury, and of the Insane Asylum, Columbia Institute, and Commissioner of Public Buildings, respectively, for their use, and one hundred copies of the report of the Bureau of Engineers, for the use of said bureau. And he shall not print any greater number of said reports unless otherwise directed by either House of Congress.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That seven thousand copies of the "Commercial Relations," annually prepared under the direction of the Secretary of State, be printed and distributed as follows, namely, the usual number (one thousand five hundred and fifty) for the Houses of Congress; four hundred and fifty for the State Department; two thousand for the use of the members of the Senate; and three thousand for the use of members of the House.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the annual report of the Postmaster General of offers received and contracts for conveying the mails, in compliance with the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth sections of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1836; also that portion of the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, giving an abstract of offers (embracing those which are rejected as well as those which are accepted) received for furnishing articles coming under the cognizance of the bureau of the Navy Department, in part compliance with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1843; and also that portion of the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, giving Indian disbursements, in part compliance with the act of Congress approved July 5, 1862, be no longer printed unless specially ordered by either House of Congress; and that such portions of the above-mentioned acts as authorized the publication of the above-mentioned portions of the annual reports of the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Interior, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate to furnish the Superintendent of Public Printing with correct copies of all laws and joint resolutions as soon as possible after their approval by the President of the United States, and that the Superintendent shall immediately have them printed separately, three hundred of each for the use of the Senate and one thousand for the use of the House of Representatives; and in addition thereto he shall cause to be printed and bound, at the close of each session of Congress, three thousand copies thereof for the use of the Senate and ten thousand copies for the use of the House, with a complete index, prepared under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That section seven of the joint resolution in relation to the public printing, approved June 23, 1860, be so amended as to require the Superintendent of Public Printing to advertise only in two newspapers published in the cities of New York, Cincinnati, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, for thirty days prior to the 1st day of November of each year, for proposals for furnishing the paper necessary for the execution of the public printing.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all lithographing and engraving, where the probable total cost of the maps or plates illustrating or accompanying any one work exceeds $250, shall be awarded to the lowest and best bidder for the interests of the Government, due regard being paid to the execution of the work, after due advertisement by the Superintendent of Public Printing, under direction of the Joint Committee on Printing: Provided, That the Joint Committee on Public Printing be authorized to empower the Superintendent of Public Printing to make immediate contracts for engraving whenever in their opinion the exigencies of the public service will not justify waiting for advertisement and award.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever any person may desire extra copies of any document printed at the Government printing office, by authority of law, he shall notify the Superintendent of Public Printing of the number of copies desired previous to its being put to press, and shall pay in advance the estimated cost thereof to said Superintendent, who shall be authorized, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, to furnish such extra copies; and the money so received, together with moneys received by him from the sales of paper shavings and imperfections, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the appropriations for public printing, binding, and paper, respectively, as designated by said Superintendent; and further, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to cause the moneys heretofore deposited by said Superintendent in the Treasury of the United States, being the proceeds of sales of paper shavings and imperfections, to be placed to the credit of the appropriations aforesaid, which said several sums of money shall be subject to the requisition of said Superintendent in the manner now prescribed by law.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That whenever papers relating to foreign affairs shall be communicated to Congress, at the request of either House of Congress, or by direction of the President of the United States, it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of Public Printing to cause to be printed and bound, in addition to the usual number, four thousand copies for the use of the members of the Senate, seven thousand copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, and such number for the Executive Department, as the President shall direct.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the forms and style in which the printing or binding ordered by any of the Departments shall be executed, the materials and size of type to be used shall be determined by the Superintendent of Public Printing, having proper regard to economy, workmanship, and the purposes for which the work is needed.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all laws or parts of laws, joint resolutions or parts of joint resolutions, conflicting with the above provisions, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to amend the amendment of the committee. In line fourteen, section five, I move to strike out "July 5, 1862," and insert "June 30, 1834." It is a mistake in the description of a law.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In line three, section nine, I move to strike out the word "he" and insert "and;" and in the sixth line of the same section strike out the word "who" and insert "the Superintendent."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The object of the bill is to regulate and expedite the printing of the public documents, and also to introduce some economy into that branch of the public business. There are some novel provisions that the committee have considered very maturely, and as I do not wish to take the Senate by surprise, I will explain what they are.

The purpose of the first section is in accordance with an act that was passed at the last session, but has not been fully carried into effect, to require that the documents accompanying the President's message shall be placed in the hands of the Public Printer so early that they may be laid before us in the early part of the session, in January, so that the recommendations contained in them may receive the action of Congress. The first section also provides that the Joint Committee on Printing shall appoint some competent person who shall edit and select such portions of the documents accompanying the President's message so placed in their hands as shall, in the judgment of the committee, be desirable for popular distribution, and to prepare an index to the same. These documents now are without indexes; they are exceedingly voluminous; the publication of the whole of them is useless, and very expensive; the publication of a portion of them is very desirable for the purpose of popular information, and the bill proposes that a competent person shall be selected to abridge, edit, and index them, which will render them far more valuable.

Mr. SUMNER. If my friend will allow me I will ask him whether upon the whole it would not be better to insert before the word "index" the word "alphabetical" as a further explanation. I should be afraid that the person to whom he confided this might discharge it in an imperfect way merely by preparing an index not according to the alphabet, but just according to the order of the contents, which I think would not be satisfactory.

Mr. ANTHONY. The suggestion is a very proper one, and I should be glad to have it incorporated into the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. My amendment is in the thirteenth line of the first section of the amendment of the committee before the word "index" to insert the word "alphabetical." I make that motion.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. At every session of Congress we are called upon by the heads of Departments to publish additional numbers of the reports of the various bureaus. These requests frequently come after the type has been distributed. We passed such a resolution to-day. Additional numbers are called for by the heads of Departments, and are represented to be necessary for the efficiency of the public service, and we generally print them. The third section provides that a certain number of the reports of the heads of bureaus, such a number as has been found necessary and is thought proper by the heads of Departments, shall be printed when the type is first set, and no greater number is allowed to be printed except by order of either House of Congress.

The fourth section provides for the printing of the Commercial Relations, as that volume has been printed every year. The fifth section provides that the offers for carrying the mail reported by the Postmaster General, which forms a book of the dimensions I now exhibit, over eight hundred pages, the offers rejected as well as those accepted, shall not hereafter be printed. The Senator from Vermont will probably agree that there is no need of printing that cumbersome document.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is impossible for me to say how much dishonesty the ordering of that publication corrected, or how much will exist if it be not continued; but while it is published I see very little use in it, although it may be perhaps that it prevents a great deal of evil that would happen if it were not published.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is a subject for the Senate to consider. This is a document that is printed every year, giving all the bids for carrying the mail, those accepted and those rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. How long has it been printed?

Mr. ANTHONY. Since 1836. I do not see any reason why these offers of bids should be printed rather than those of the War Department, which must be far more voluminous. They are not printed, nor are any others, except the bids in the Navy Department and some bids of the Indian bureau. The same section also repeals the law providing for printing, in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, the offers for bids in the Navy Department. That publication I hold in my hands. Here are all the bids for contracts, and propositions to the Navy Department, those that are accepted and those that are rejected, and they form a volume of about four hundred pages.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is got up for the same reason and on the same principle as the other, to prevent frauds.

Mr. ANTHONY. The bill proposes to repeal the law that requires that to be printed, and also to repeal the law requiring to be printed a portion of the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior giving the Indian disbursements. The Senate refused to print that report this year; but there has been a law, or a practice that has had the force of law, to print it every year with the message and accompanying documents. It came in late this year, and the Senate refused to print it.

The sixth section is in compliance with a resolution passed by the Senate, and requires that every law, when it has passed Congress and been approved by the President, shall be printed, three hundred copies for the use of the Senate and one thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, so that we may have them on our files to refer to.

The seventh section repeals a requirement that the contracts for paper shall be advertised in a large number of newspapers all over the country, which is quite useless. They were required to be advertised in Richmond, Charleston, Mobile, &c. Our southern "brethren" had them put in pretty much every paper South. It provides that the joint resolution of June 23, 1860, in relation to the public printing, "be so amended as to require the Superintendent of Public Printing to advertise only in two newspapers published in the cities of New York, Cincinnati, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore."

The eighth section requires that all lithographing and engraving, where the probable cost will exceed $250, shall be awarded to the lowest and best bidder for the interests of the Government, but allows this to be modified in cases where, in the opinion of the Joint Committee on Printing, the exigencies of the public service will not justify waiting for advertisement.

Mr. HOWE. Why "lowest and best?"

Mr. ANTHONY. Every bid is accompanied by specimens of the work of the bidder. If a man offers a bid very low and his work is very bad, the committee would not take it. No bids are received by the committee except from those who are actually engaged in the business, and can do the work themselves. No speculative bids are received.

The ninth section provides that the sales of paper shavings and imperfections, &c., the sweepings and wastage of the printing office, shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the printing fund.

The tenth section is intended to meet a case which we had at the present session. It was found necessary, after the message and accompanying documents had been printed and the type distributed, to print ten thousand extra copies of the foreign correspondence. It was ordered by the House of Representatives, not by the Senate. It was necessary to set up the type anew for two or three volumes. This provision is to print four thousand copies for the use of the Senate, seven thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, and such number for the Executive Department as the President shall direct.

Mr. COLLAMER. This year, or every year?

Mr. ANTHONY. These are papers relating to foreign affairs, communicated to Congress by request of either House or direction of the President, so that what is required by the Department may be printed while the type is standing, and the President is the judge of the number.

Mr. COLLAMER. Does that mean correspondence published by the State Department this year, or every year?

Mr. ANTHONY. In future years. This is to be a permanent law.

Mr. SUMNER. But there is one point to which I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Printing. I do not know whether it is in order or whether the Senator desires that we shall make propositions of amendment now.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me finish what little I have to say, and then amendments can be moved.

The ninth section also provides that the Superintendent of Public Printing, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, may print documents for sale to any persons who will pay the cost of the same, and pay the money to the Superintendent of Public Printing before the document is put to press. This is the only Government, I believe, that prints public documents which does not sell them. You can buy any parliamentary document in England; you can buy any public document in France that is printed, at the book-stores. The documents in England are sold at just above the cost of waste paper, so that people will not buy them for waste paper, and yet bringing it as near to a gratuitous distribution as they can without tempting people to get them to sell for waste paper. There are a great many documents that are wanted for libraries, public and private, by persons that feel a delicacy in asking for them, and perhaps do not get them even if they do ask for them, and who would be very glad to buy them. I can see no possible reason why they should not have that privilege. It would place the public documents where we want them, in the hands of people who would read them. It would relieve the Treasury of the expense of publishing so many for gratuitous distribution, and prevent the sending of a great many numbers of the same document to the same person.

These are the main provisions of the bill, I believe.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to call the attention of my friend to the operation of section ten, which relates to the publication of papers concerning foreign affairs. I am inclined to think that the language is broader than he intended. It is as follows:

That whenever papers relating to foreign affairs shall be communicated to Congress, at the request of either House of Congress, or by direction of the President of the United States, it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of Public Printing to cause to be printed and bound, in addition to the usual number, four thousand copies for the use of the members of the Senate, seven thousand copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, and such number for the Executive Department as the President shall direct.

It will be perceived that that is applicable to all papers relating to foreign affairs which may be communicated to Congress, not only at the beginning of the session, but at any time during the session. The Senator is aware that almost every week, or at least very often, a call is made by the Senate, or by the House of Representatives, on the President for certain publications relating to some foreign question. For instance, it was only yesterday, I think, that the Senate received, in answer to a call, a communication from the President covering certain papers concerning the relations between Chili and Bolivia, and they were ordered at once to be printed for the use of the Senate. Now, the clause as it stands would be applicable to that class of communications. I doubt whether the Senator intends that they should be covered by it. Do we desire to multiply these communications to that extent?

Mr. ANTHONY. This provision was intended to cover the annual report.

Mr. SUMNER. So I supposed, and I was therefore going to suggest whether some word should not be introduced to qualify the general language of the clause. I will suggest the insertion of the words "at the beginning of the session of Congress" after "United States," in the fourth line of the section. That would limit it to the mass of foreign correspondence, covering, in the main, the correspondence for the whole year, which is annually communicated with the President's message.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to make a suggestion in regard to this section. According to the very general words in which it is framed, anything relating to foreign affairs communicated by order of the President to either House of Congress is to be published. The President may send confidential messages and treaties to the Senate, which ought not to be published, certainly not extra copies.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator remembers that those are sent in executive session, and therefore they would not come under the operation of this clause.

Mr. COLLAMER. They would come within the words of it, for the language covers communications sent to either House.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that the object which we should have in view is to provide for the publication of the foreign papers communicated annually with the President's message.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is it.

Mr. SUMNER. And we need not go beyond that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move after the word "Congress," in the third line of the section, to strike out the words "at the request of either House of Congress or by direction of the President of the United States," and in lieu of those words to insert "accompanying the annual message of the President."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to make a suggestion in relation to the fifth section, which repeals the law requiring the offers for carrying the mail, and also the offers for contracts for supplies for the Navy Department, to be published. I take it that under our present system the cost of the printing of those books would not be much if there were no extra numbers printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. There will be no extra copies under this bill, because they will not be in the abridged and edited documents.

Mr. COLLAMER. The question is whether the publication of them would be very expensive under our present system. The object of the law in relation to the Post Office Department, which was passed nearly thirty years ago, was that these bids should be put into such a form that the community could all see that the law which required the lowest bid to be taken was carried into execution fairly. In order to enable the community to judge of that, it was required that all proposals and acceptances should be published, so that it could always be seen exactly how they stood. I cannot say how far that has checked fraud; but that was the purpose of it. So it was in the Navy Department and in the Indian bureau. It is impossible to say what would be the effect of the repeal, but I very much doubt whether on the whole it is advisable to repeal these laws. The inclination of my opinion is that there were large frauds existing which occasioned their passage, and that the same frauds might recur if we repeal them. I am therefore rather inclined to think that the fifth section had better not be retained in the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee are not very strenuous in regard to the fifth section. The only object was to save the cost of printing voluminous documents which seemed to us to be of very little use. The Senator from Vermont, who has been at the head of the Post Office Department, is much better able to judge than we as to the value of this publication; but it seems to me that if we publish the Post Office bids and the Navy bids we ought equally to publish the Army bids, which must be more numerous and involve immensely greater cost than both of the others together.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am not at all tenacious of my view on this question. Of course my experience in the Department could furnish no light whatever on this point, because all the time I was there this law was in operation, and I never had an opportunity to see how we could have got along without it. The law having been in operation for the last twenty-eight years, I can merely say that there have not been charges of fraud in the Department to any great extent in relation to contracts. Whether that has been the influence of this publication is more than I can say. I do not know how that fact is. I do not know what is the expense of the publication, but I take it now, with the present price of paper, it would be more than it has heretofore been.

Mr. ANTHONY. If only a few copies are printed the price of paper does not enter so much into it. Sometimes four or five thousand copies of this document have been printed with the President's message, through inadvertence, I suppose.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am not at all tenacious as to my view on this point. It may be that the expense had better be saved by foregoing the publication, and if we shall find hereafter that it works evil to omit it, we can readopt it. I merely wanted to say that there is no experience under the law which would enable a man in the Department to speak of the effect of its repeal.

Mr. SUMNER. There must be considerable expense in the publication, and also a good deal of work. I doubt whether we ought to continue it in this permanent statute, unless we see a good reason for it; and what the Senator from Rhode Island has remarked is with me almost decisive, when he reminds us that in the War Department, where the contracts are on a much larger scale, there is no such publication. If such a publication is required in the Post Office Department, I should say it must, for a stronger reason, be required in the War Department; but nobody has suggested it in the War Department, and I have never heard any complaint because there was no such publication in the War Department.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is one thing gentlemen must bear in mind about the Post Office Department, which would incline the mind to go in favor of repealing the law requiring the publication; and that is, the fact that the law requires that all the bids shall be not only opened and marked in the presence of the Postmaster General and an assistant, or by two Assistant Postmasters General, but that they shall be recorded in a book. All the bids are recorded, and the one accepted is checked upon the book, and that book stands there for everybody to see. This is a publication of the same thing.

Mr. HALE. I concur in the remarks that have been made by the Senator from Vermont in regard to the publication of the bids for naval supplies, and I should be very loth at the present time to see the law requiring that publication repealed. It is notorious that frauds have been committed there, and I believe that it is a matter of notoriety that several contractors are now in prison for frauds that have been perpetrated on the Navy Department. I think that the publication of this document, so far as the naval bids are concerned, is eminently wise. It is certain that very great frauds have been perpetrated by contractors on this Department, the evidence of which, I trust, before the session is over, will be laid before the Senate, and which have been brought to light mainly by this publication. I think there is a great deal of truth in the remark of the Senator from Vermont, that he does not know that this publication prevents any frauds, but it is impossible to say what it would be without it. The expense of the publication is not very large, and it is of consequence not only that the laws should be executed honestly, but that the people should know that they are executed honestly, and I think that the publication of these bids is a great safeguard to the public, and I think it is wise that they should be published. As the expense is trifling, I hope that, for the present at least, this alteration of the law will not be made. I do not know anything about the Indian department, and am not prepared to say whether those bids should be published; but to bring the matter before the Senate I move to strike out the fifth section.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he has any information from the Post Office Department in regard to the operation of this publication. Does that Department find it important?

Mr. ANTHONY. Neither Department thinks it necessary, but the Secretaries are very reluctant to advise the suppression of anything which is at all calculated to expose fraud in their Departments. There having been so much said about frauds in naval contracts, the Navy Department would give us advice on the subject, but the Post Office Department thought the publication was useless.

Mr. SUMNER. I must say that I am content to follow that testimony, for I regard it as in the nature of testimony.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. POWELL. The Committee on Printing, when they had this bill under consideration, paid a good deal of attention to the clause which it is now proposed to strike out, and after the best information they could get from the Departments they thought it was unnecessary to continue these publications, and that to stop them would be a great saving of expense. But as there are suggestions that perhaps it would prevent fraud to publish these bids, I, for one of the committee, am rather disposed to vote to strike out the section. Anything that will prevent fraud on the Government at a small expense I think is proper. The committee were of opinion, however, from the information they got, that it would not to any great extent prevent fraud, and to prevent the printing would be a saving of expense to the Government, and they were moved by that consideration.

Mr. HALE. Let me make a statement of facts which will govern me entirely. When this publication of the contracts of the Navy Department came out, there was a house in Boston who had been concerned in naval contracts considerably that assailed certain contractors in a pamphlet. It was not an attack upon the Navy Department, as I understand it, but it was principally an attack upon certain contractors, who, it was alleged, had entered into a combination, and by means of which very large frauds had been perpetrated upon the Navy Department. For instance, it was alleged—and I think the evidence upon the books will show that it is not entirely without foundation—that certain contractors, A, B, C, and D, had entered into a combination to bid at certain prices; and the lowest bid of A would be, we will say, twice or three times the value of the article, and still he would be the lowest bidder, because three other parties would bid and they would go a little higher than the lowest bidder, and the lowest bidder in some instances bid one hundred per cent., and in some two hundred per cent., higher than the market price; and those contracts were executed.

This publication led to the institution of a committee of investigation in the Senate, who have not yet completed their inquiries, and led to various discussions and action upon the part of the Navy Department; and the Navy Department, without any knowledge of mine as to what evidence they proceeded upon, have arrested and now hold in prison several of the individuals that are implicated in this publication. I presume and have not the slightest doubt that the Navy Department proceeded upon what was satisfactory evidence, and in an earnest and honest desire to further and aid the purity of the administration of the law in this respect; but the fact that these charges have been made, and that the evidence of them is found in this publication at this time, suggests to me that it is a very unfortunate and unpropitious time to dispense with it. It would give rise to unjust insinuations, to say the least, because people would be apt to inquire, "If through this publication these frauds have been brought to light, and these contractors are now in prison for them, why do you repeal the law which gives the evidence by which these frauds are brought to light?"

It is for these reasons that I think it would be unwise at the present time to repeal this law, so far as the Navy Department is concerned.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am quite indifferent, and I think I can speak for the committee, whether this section is retained or not. It seemed to us on the whole that the expense was useless, and that there was no particular propriety in selecting these two Departments and one bureau for an exposure that was not required of the others. Either this section should be adopted or else the contracts in the War Department should be exposed and published in the same way. I do not see any reason for selecting these from the others, but still it is a matter that I care little about.

Mr. GRIMES. The reason why there was a distinction made between the War Department and the Navy Department, I suppose, was because the Navy Department purchases were originally quite small and were always made in the vicinity of the navy-yard, and always made in response to an advertisement, and consequently a contract in writing immediately afterwards followed, but the Army was obliged to be supplied at all the posts that we had when we laid out our system all along on our Atlantic coast, on our northern lake coast, on the line of the Indian territory, and on our southern coast, and exigencies arose that required an immediate supply for the Army which could not be anticipated, but which were anticipated in the Navy.

I hope this amendment will be adopted, and that the section will be stricken out, not because I believe the publication of these bids ever has been or ever will be instrumental in developing any frauds. I think it will turn out that the frauds to which the Senator from New Hampshire alluded, which I suppose grew out of fictitious bidding, were not called to light, and the publication that has been referred to was not made by the firm or the member of the firm that did make it, until after he had been rebuked by the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks himself for having made fictitious bids and been called upon to respond and to deliver over some of the articles for which those fictitious bids were made. But I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that if you repeal this law now you will immediately cause men throughout the country to exclaim, "Why do you repeal this law just at this time; why not let these bids be published as they have been published?" Although everything may be as pure as it is possible for any money transaction to be, there are plenty of men in the country who will avail themselves of this opportunity to cry at once that there is blasing evidence against the Navy Department, and that we are attempting to cover it up. I trust we shall let this law stand as it is, at any rate for the present; and if it becomes necessary hereafter to repeal it, we can then do so.

Mr. HOWE. It may or may not be necessary or expedient to publish the bids made in the Navy Department and in the War Department and the disbursements made by the Secretary of the Interior on Indian account, but I do suspect that there is not the slightest necessity for making a publication of the bids made in the Post Office Department for postal service. Those contracts are let almost universally for four years. The great majority of the bidders at each successive letting are about the same class of men, and so far as my knowledge goes each bidder is so well acquainted with the way in which these contracts are let that as soon as the biddings are made public in the Department, or as soon thereafter as letters can inform him, every man who makes a bid becomes informed just how his bid ranges with other bids. I have had occasion to receive letters from bidders for these contracts repeatedly, and I have always found them very well informed as to how the bidding stood. When they lost a contract they seemed to know precisely the difference between their bid and the bid that secured the contract. I do not think there is the slightest necessity for this publication, and as it seems to me to be urged here that there may be some necessity for publishing the other classes of bids, I desire to amend the section so as to accomplish that object. I believe it is in order now to move to amend the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly. Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the fifth section by striking out the following words from line six to line fifteen:

Also that portion of the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy giving an abstract of orders (embracing those which are rejected as well as those which are accepted) received for furnishing articles coming under the cognizance of the bureaus of the Navy Department, in part compliance with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1843; and also that portion of the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior giving Indian disbursements, in part compliance with the act of Congress approved June 30, 1834.

And then in line seventeen, the letter "s" should be stricken out at the end of the words "portions" and "acts;" and in the same line, the word "said" should be inserted before "publication;" and in lines eighteen, nineteen, and twenty, the words, "of the above-mentioned portions of the annual reports of the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Interior," should be stricken out. The result of these amendments, if they be adopted, will be that the bids in the Navy Department and in the Interior Department will be published as heretofore, and the publication of bids in the Post Office Department will be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moved to strike out the fifth section of the amendment of the committee. Before that question is taken, the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to amend the section; and the question is on that amendment.

Several SENATORS. What is it?

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps I had better state once more that the object of the amendment that I move is to leave the law as it now stands in reference to the publication of bids made under orders of the Navy Department and the Interior Department, but to stop the publication of bids made in the Post Office Department; to distinguish between bids in these different Departments. I am told that the expense of publishing the Post Office bids is much heavier than that incurred in the publication of the other classes of bids, and there seems to me to be no sort of necessity for publishing them, for the reason that I stated just now. The same classes of bidders, the same individuals almost as a rule make these bids, from time to time. The contracts are let for four years. The carrying of the mails is a business. It is the business of certain persons, and they know how the contracts are advertised a long time before they are let; many months before. About the same class of persons bid for them, and the moment the bids are published in the Department those who make bids take care to be informed through their correspondents here just how the bids are. Every man whose bid is rejected knows the difference between his bid and the bid of the person who is accepted and who gets the contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be pardoned by the Senator from Wisconsin, perhaps, for suggesting that the better way for him would be to move his amendment after the question shall have been taken on the motion to strike out the section, because if the word which he proposes to insert be inserted and the section then be stricken out those words will go with it, and if the Senate should agree to his amendment and then should refuse to strike out the section his amendment would fall.

Mr. HOWE. I do not exactly understand the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate may agree to strike out of the section the words which the Senator desires to have stricken out, and then may refuse to strike out the rest of the section, and then the result of that would be that the words that he desires to have stricken out would not be stricken out of the section, because the amendment as amended would not be agreed to. If, however, the Senate shall negative the proposition to strike out the whole section, it will then be open for him to move to strike out those words.

Mr. HOWE. But if the Senate strike out the whole section, the whole section will have gone. I saw that some Senators here desired to retain a part of this section, the publication of some of these bids, and the main objection seemed to be—it was so urged by the chairman of the committee—against the publication of the Post Office bids.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the whole section shall be retained, the Senator can then move to strike out these words; and the effect of that motion, if adopted, would be to retain the part which he desires to retain. The Chair has no choice, but only makes the suggestion.

Mr. HOWE. I have but very little choice about it myself. I was trying to accommodate the section so as to meet the views of those who want to publish a part of these bids and to meet my own views, who certainly do not want any publication of the bids of the Post Office Department. As, however, I care but very little about it, I am willing to withdraw my amendment and let the vote be taken on striking out the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, which is to strike out the fifth section of the amendment reported by the Committee on Printing; and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 5, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, and Trumbull—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Canfield, Cowan, Harding, Hicks, Howard, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Willey, and Wright—16.

So the motion to strike out did not prevail.

Mr. HOWE. I now renew my amendment to strike out of the section the words beginning with the word "also," in line five, to the word "be," in line fifteen; to strike out the letter "s" at the end of the words "portions" and "acts," in line seventeen; to insert "said" before "publication," in line eighteen; and to strike out all after the word "publication" to the word "be," in the twentieth line; so as to make the section read:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the annual report of the Postmaster General of offers received and contracts for conveying the mails, in compliance with the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth sections of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1836, be no longer printed unless specially ordered by either House of Congress; and that such portion of the above-mentioned act as authorized the said publication be and the same is hereby repealed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In lines seven, eight, and nine of the sixth section of the committee's amendment, I move to strike out the words "have them printed separately, three hundred of each for the use of the Senate, and one thousand for the use of the House of Representatives," and to insert "cause to be printed separately the usual number for the use of the two Houses of Congress."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In the thirteenth line of the sixth section I move to insert the word "alphabetical" before "index."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move a new section to come in after the first section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint some competent person to edit the printing of the official reports of the operations of the Army of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I want the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Printing a moment. Does not this bill require a permanent session of the Joint Committee on Printing, or require them to be in session during the month of November, to say the least?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not see how that is. It requires that the Joint Committee on Printing shall appoint some suitable person to edit and index the compilation. That person, of course, will be appointed at the close of the session to continue till the next session.

Mr. HALE. Let me state, then, the objection that strikes my mind. The provision is:

That hereafter, instead of furnishing manuscript copies of the documents usually accompanying their annual reports to each House of Congress, or to the Superintendent of Public Printing, the heads of the several Departments of Government shall transmit them, on or before the 1st day of November in each year, to the Joint Committee of Congress on Public Printing; and it shall be the duty of that joint committee—

That is, after they are so transmitted to them—to appoint some competent person, who shall edit and select such portions of the documents so placed in their hands as shall, in the judgment of the committee, be desirable for popular distribution, and to prepare an index to the same.

It seems to me that that section looks to a session of the joint committee from the 1st of November.

Mr. COLLAMER. Every other year they cannot exist.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator from Vermont well suggests, they cannot be in existence on the 1st day of November every other year, because they would have expired by limitation on the previous 4th of March.

Several SENATORS. It is time to adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. This can be amended in one moment, and I am very anxious to have the bill finished to-night. The objection is well taken, and it is easily corrected by saying "on or before the 1st day of November in each year, to the Superintendent of Public Printing," instead of "Joint Committee of," and "and that it shall be the duty of the Joint Committee on Printing to appoint," &c.

Mr. HALE. The difficulty then is as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, that every other year there will be no joint committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Joint Committee on Printing will appoint some suitable person to edit the documents, and he will remain until some other person is appointed.

Mr. COLLAMER. Who is to decide what is to be published?

Mr. ANTHONY. That person.

Mr. HALE. No. "It shall be the duty of that joint committee to appoint some competent person, who shall edit and select such portions of the documents so placed in their hands as shall, in the judgment of the committee, be desirable for popular distribution."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President—

Mr. GRIMES. Let us adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have the floor.

Mr. GRIMES. When the Senator yields the floor I shall move to adjourn, for the reason that there is a question in this measure: it proposes to go into the book-publishing business, and I want to hear that discussed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not yield the floor. If the Senator from Iowa desires to discuss the bill, I certainly shall not press it now; but I was not aware of that. I supposed that only this amendment remained, and that it would take but a few minutes to dispose of the bill. The section has been altered since it was revised by me, and I see the force of the objection of the Senator from New Hampshire. I can readily propose an amendment to obviate it, but if the Senator from Iowa wishes to discuss any portion of the bill I shall not press it now.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not say and I do not now say that I propose to discuss the bill, but I said that this is a new proposition entirely; it authorizes the Committee on Public Printing, or the agent that they may appoint, to direct the publishing of a certain number of public documents, whichever they may select, not for distribution among the members alone, but for sale in such a manner as may be designated.

Mr. ANTHONY. In such a manner as is designated in the bill; that is, the purchaser paying the money before the documents are printed.

Mr. GRIMES. That is a new question; it has not been discussed by the Senator from Rhode Island or anybody else; and I think that before we establish a rule of that description the Senate should give more consideration to it than we are prepared to give to it this evening. That is my impression. It is a very important question out of which a great many complications and a very large expense may grow.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator will allow me to amend this section first, and then I will give way to a motion to adjourn. I move to amend the first section so that it will read—

Mr. HALE. I think you had better take time to look at that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 17, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. Hosmer, of Buffalo, New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the Navy appropriation bill, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 151) "making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865," have met, and after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House concur in the amendments of the Senate to said bill numbered thirteen, fourteen, eighteen, nineteen, twenty, and twenty-four.

That the Senate recede from its amendments to said bill numbered twenty-two and twenty-three.

That the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to said bill numbered one.

That the House concur in the amendment of the Senate to said bill numbered twenty-seven, with the following amendment:

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That out of the appropriation of $750,000 for a floating dry-dock at navy-yard, New York, provided for by the act making appropriations for the naval service of the United States, approved 3d of March, 1863, the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to construct one or two dry-docks, as he may deem expedient, at New York and Philadelphia, at $350,000 each, and to expend the balance of said appropriation, if it shall be necessary, to enlarge the sectional docks to a capacity to receive the large vessels now building.

JOHN P. HALL,
P. G. VAN WINKLE,
L. W. POWELL,
ALEX. H. RICE,
JAMES E. ENGLISH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendments be read, so that the House may understand what has been the action of the committee of conference.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I can satisfy the gentleman by informing him of what the action of the committee has been from the memoranda I have here, but I have no objection to the amendments being read.

The amendments were read in extenso.

Mr. STEVENS. What is the appropriation of $75,000 for?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The first amendment in which the House concurred with the Senate was in reference to an appropriation of $75,000 for building a hospital at Mare island, California. The service in California demands that some further accommodation should be made for the sick and disabled seamen upon that coast. There have been plans and specifications made for a very large and ornamental structure there, the cost of which it is supposed will be about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery does not coincide with the view heretofore taken of the expediency of a building at such a cost at that point. He is of the opinion that for the sum of $75,000 to be now appropriated a plain and substantial and sufficiently commodious building for the purposes of that coast for the present time can be constructed. The committee of conference on the part of the House were unanimous in regard to making this appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. Is this $75,000 the whole amount?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I think it will be. It results from the change of the plan of the building to a more simple structure.

The fourteenth amendment relates to the salary of the constructing engineer, reducing it from $3,500 to $3,200, which is the salary of the commandant, the engineer now receiving more than his superior. The others relate to the necessary work at Key West. One amendment relates to the salaries of the assistant astronomers, or aids, to the Observatory at Washington, by which the number is reduced from four to three, and the salaries of the four are divided among the three, as agreed upon. The last amendment authorizes the Navy Department to use at its discretion an appropriation of $750,000 made during the last Congress.

The report of the committee was adopted.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMODORE CHARLES WILKES.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House the proceedings of the court of inquiry in the case of Commodore Charles Wilkes.

VIRGINIA ELECTIONS.

Mr. DAWES. I call up the election case of Joseph Segar, in order that it may now be acted on. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution of the Committee of Elections.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That Joseph Segar is not entitled to a seat as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the first district of Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. I desire also to say that there is another report of the committee, which will be found in House document No. 59, in reference to the claim of Lucius H. Chandler to a seat in this Congress from the second district of Virginia, and as the reports in these two cases are based upon an almost precisely similar state of facts, it would be a great saving of time if the House would consider the two cases together. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to consider both cases as before them.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to detain the House but a few moments. The principles involved in these cases are precisely the same as those which have been presented, argued, and adjudicated by the House over and over again in the last two or three years, and there is therefore no necessity of more than simply stating the facts as they appear.

The district which Mr. Segar claims to represent is the first congressional district of Virginia, composed of the counties of Accomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, York, Northumberland, Westmoreland, Richmond, Essex, Lancaster, Middlesex, King and Queen, King William, New Kent, Gloucester, Matthews, James City, Warwick, Charles City, King George, and Caroline. The vote on which Mr. Segar claims to have been elected was cast on the last Thursday of May, 1862, the time provided by law for the regular election of the State of Virginia. At that time there were votes cast in Accomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, and York counties; the precise number not having been ascertained, but as nearly as has been ascertained was 1,667, as follows:

In Accomac.....	1,120
Northampton.....	305
Elizabeth City and York.....	242

Total number of votes..... 1,667

Of these, Mr. Segar received about 1,300 votes. There was no election held in any other part of the district on that day. A comparison of these four counties with the remainder of the district either in respect to territory or population shows that but a very small portion of the district was represented.

In 1860 the aggregate population of the district was 160,834. Of these there were white males, 34,013; total whites, 68,159. Of the counties which voted in this election there were white males, 9,772, out of 34,013 in the whole district; and the entire number of whites in these counties was only 19,181 out of 68,159 in the whole district, and but 37,165 out of 160,834 aggregate population.

The reason why no election was held in any other portion of this district is well known to everybody: because the rest of the district was in the possession of the rebel military authorities, and it was utterly impossible to hold an election there.

So far as this election was held; I believe it was in conformity to law. These gentlemen presented at the commencement of the present session of Congress certificates made out in conformity to the requirements of the law of Virginia.

Mr. Segar claimed that, having the certificate properly made out by the proper authorities, he was entitled to a seat here without contest; but the Committee of Elections supposed these credentials were referred to them for the purpose of examining into this whole election and reporting its character to the House. The committee have made such an examination, and upon the principles which have heretofore been submitted and acted on by the House, that where a large portion of a district was within rebel control, a larger portion than was in our hands, there could be no free election, the committee came to the conclusion that a majority of the electors in this congressional election were not free to vote, and that, therefore, upon this principle heretofore decided, Mr. Segar was not properly elected a member of this House, and is not entitled to a seat.

It gives pleasure to the committee to testify to the loyalty and sacrifices of Mr. Segar in the cause of the Union, and to express regret that, in accordance with the principles which they have adopted, and with the directions which they conceive were given them by the House, they found it impossible to come to the conclusion that would admit him to a seat here.

The other case is that of Mr. Lucius H. Chandler, who claims to represent the second congressional district of Virginia, composed of the counties of Brunswick, Dinwiddie, Greenville, Isle of Wight, Nansemond, Norfolk, Princess Anne, Prince George, Southampton, Surry, and Sussex. The whole population of this district in 1860 was 156,626; total number of whites, 74,230; the total number of white males, 36,879. Of these, 779 voted, and 778 of them voted for Mr. Chandler. Voting places were opened on the day of this election in nine places in the county of Norfolk and cities of Portsmouth and Norfolk. No polls were opened in any other portion of the district; and I may here remark that I believe nearly all the votes cast were from the city of Norfolk.

Comparing, then, these cities and county with the entire district, and it will be seen at once that only a very small portion of the district participated in this election, and for the same reason precisely that caused the paucity of the vote in Mr. Segar's district, namely, that the rebels held all the rest of the district in subjection and prevented the polls from being opened. The committee have, therefore, for precisely the same reason as in the case of Mr. Segar, reported against the admission of Mr. Chandler to a seat as a Representative in this Congress.

These gentlemen are now present in the House and desire to be heard, as they have the right to be under the rule which has been adopted by the House; and I now yield the floor to permit them to address the House in defense of their own claims.

Mr. SEGAR. In the fall of 1861 a small number of the loyal voters of the county of Elizabeth City, the county of my residence, appeared at the polls, in pursuance of a proclamation of Francis H. Pierpont, then the recognized loyal Governor of Virginia, and cast their votes for the humble individual before you, as their Representative in the Thirty-Seventh Congress. At the time I was far away from my home, treading, for the first time in my life, the soil of New England; and not even aware that an election was in contemplation. At first, I am frank to confess, I had no purpose of appropriating to myself the intended honor, having grave doubts of the legitimacy of the Wheeling government, under the auspices of which the election had taken place. But my doubts on that point having been removed by an able argument of the late Benjamin F. Hallet, of Boston, published in the Boston Post, and to which my attention was called by a distinguished member of the Boston bar, I determined finally to make claim to the proffered seat. I accordingly appeared here to do so, but the House thought fit not to admit me.

The chief objections taken to my admission were, first, the one still raised, that all the loyal voters of the district had not had an opportunity of indicating their choice at the polls, and, secondly, that the election having been one to supply a vacancy, it should have been held by writ of election, and not by executive proclamation.

Regarding the former of these objections as not soundly taken, and regardless of the rights of the State of which he was the acknowledged chief magistrate, Governor Pierpont issued a writ for a new election. In this second election, I beg the House specially to note, only three counties voted—Accomac, Northampton, and Elizabeth City—and the vote cast was only 1,018, of which I received 559; and this number being a majority of the votes cast, I received a certificate of election, and a second time appeared in this Hall, seeking admission. You kept me out in the cold, Mr. Speaker, for some seven or eight weeks, but finally, either taking pity on me, or believing me entitled to membership, you kindly rescued me from my shivering position outside, brought me within these doors, and conducted me to a seat in this House of Commons of this great nation. I took the seat; and though it is not mine to boast a brilliant, I think I may not immodestly claim to have made at least an honorable record of my representative action. Elected as an unyielding Union man, I gave outspoken Union votes, having supported every vital measure of the Government for the suppression of the rebellion.

Well, sir, supposing the point then as now raised against me to have been overruled by the solemn judgment of the House, and that the principle in my case had been definitively settled, I became a candidate for reelection, was elected by a large majority, and appeared here on the first day of the session to take my seat, never dreaming that the Clerk of the last House (Mr. Etheridge) would hesitate to place my name on his list of members elect—for I had presented a clear certificate of election, and had moreover been personally assured by him that my name was actually on his printed lists, my certificate of election being (as he said) all right—and still less conceiving it possible that the House, after the action of the last session, could for a moment hesitate over my admission. And yet how stands the case? The Clerk, at a very late hour, thought fit to erase my name from the list on which he had put it, and this House, instead of standing by the decision of the last Congress, fairly and dispassionately made, has again kept me outside from early December till the summer solstice is almost upon us. In other words, though you admitted me the last session with a vote of only three counties of my district and a vote of 559, now, when I come here with the vote of four counties and a vote of 1,300—more than twice larger now than then—your committee tell me I have no right to a seat; and while you admitted the 559 loyal voters who sent me here the last Congress to representation on this floor, you now deny it to the 1,300 who sent me to the present Congress! And what, sir, is most remarkable and not a little mortifying, many of my old colleagues who voted to let me in in 1862 refuse to admit me in 1864!

Such are, briefly, the facts of the case; and I ask the House to bear them in mind while I proceed to demonstrate, as I am confident I can, my title to the seat I claim. Of my right to it on precedent, on principle, on law, on justice, and on public policy, I have no more doubt than I have of my right to my share of the sunlight of heaven. And if my good friend from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, will but give me a patient hearing, (as I am sure he will,) I am not without hope of convincing him, not only that the conclusion of his report is erroneous, but that, on the very principles of his own report, I am entitled to a seat in this body.

I rejoice, Mr. Speaker, that this case comes up now disencumbered of all complications. It is admitted in the committee's report that there is such a political organization as the State of Virginia, an admission for which I heartily thank them, for even that has been questioned in some high quarters; that there is such a district as the first congressional district of Virginia, duly laid off under an apportionment by the census of 1860; that the election was regularly held at the times and the places appointed by law; and that I have a proper certificate of election from the officer charged by law to grant it. So that there is but a single point in the case to be considered, so far as the committee's report is concerned, and that point is, that all the loyal voters of the district not having had an opportunity of reaching the polls, I cannot be said to be their choice, and therefore should not be admitted, for it is possible (they say) that some other person might have been preferred as Representative. I think I have fairly stated the point in the committee's report, and on that point I take issue with them. I maintain exactly the reverse of the committee's reasoning: that both principle and precedent are against the conclusion of the committee, and in favor of my admission.

I hold, first, that under a precedent long ago set, (as far back as the year 1826,) it is not competent for this House even to inquire whether or why any of the voters of my district, or any other district, were absent from the polls. I refer to the case of Biddle and Richard vs. Wing, (Contested Elections in Congress, p. 504,) in which it was charged by one of the claimants, Richard, that a sufficient number of his friends had been intimidated from voting to defeat his election; in other words, that but for actual intimidation practiced at the polls a sufficient number of his friends would have voted that did not vote to have given him a majority of the votes cast, and thus elected him. It was ruled that this inquiry could not be gone into at all. I quote from the case:

"The committee are of opinion that the duty assigned to them does not impose on them an examination of the causes which may have prevented any candidate from getting a sufficient number of votes to entitle him to a seat. They consider it is only required of them to ascertain who had the greatest number of votes actually given at the election."

And again:

"The law appoints a particular time and place for the expression of the public voice; and when that time is past it is too late to inquire who did not vote or the reason why. The only question now to be determined is, for whom the greatest number of the legal votes have been given."

And further:

"In all cases of contested elections, where the question depends upon matters of fact, much difficulty is to be expected in coming to a decision; and, where there is reason for doubts, a disposition is often felt to return it to the people. This, however, ought not to be done when it is possible to ascertain what the result has been. When a people, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, have gone through with the process of an election, according to the prescribed rules, they ought not to be deprived of the advantages accruing therefrom but for the most substantial reasons. No doubts which are capable of being solved ought to be permitted to operate against them. Indeed, nothing short of the impossibility of ascertaining for whom the majority of the votes have been given ought to vacate an election; more especially if by such decision the people must, on account of their distant and dispersed situation, necessarily be unrepresented for a long period of time. The committee, being of opinion that in this case an election has been made, have proceeded to ascertain on whom the choice has fallen."

Now, if ever a principle was set out with a pencil of light, here it is; and what is it? It is this: that so important is the elective privilege that an election should never be set aside except when there is an absolute impossibility of ascertaining where the majority of the votes actually given lies; that so vital is the right of representation in popular government, that it shall never be lost where it is possible to maintain it; that those who do go to the polls shall not be deprived of the benefits of the inestimable privilege by those who do not go or could not go; that, no matter how many are absent from the polls, those who are not absent shall come in for freedom's great vital right of representation; and that however great the absence may be it shall not be taken into account, so as to interfere with the rights of non-absentees, unless there has been such general fraud or corruption as would vitiate the whole election. This is the principle laid down by the committee of 1826, and it is a sound one; it is founded preëminently in reason and in wisdom; it institutes no superfluous inquiry; it is plain and incapable of perversion; it raises the simple and disembarassing questions, who did vote, and who received the greatest number of votes given; an inquiry sufficient, where there is no absolute and general fraud, for all the practical and useful ends of the elective franchise; it preserves to us unimpaired that essential principle of all free government, that taxation and representation should be "now and forever one and inseparable;" and it is deep-founded in the certainty and purity of the elective franchise, two qualities without which the privilege were as worthless dross. It discloses a rule which, from its simplicity and consequent incapability of fraudulent perversion, is suited for all times and all circumstances; for times of high party excitement and times of political quiet; for times of degeneracy and times of lustrous virtue; for "piping times of peace" and dark times of "grim-visaged war." And the best evidence of its soundness is that it is recognized in the election laws of every State in the Union, and has been from the very birth-hour of the Union to this bleeding hour of civil strife.

Now, I ask my clear-headed friend from Massachusetts why he should not apply this philosophical reasoning of the Congress of 1826 to my constituents and their humble Representative? Is there not a peculiar and even touching applicability to their case? Sir, it looks to me as if the committee of the Nineteenth Congress had seen far down the vista of time, and, glancing with prophetic ken at the dark scenes of this unhappy rebellion, had fixed up (if I may so speak) a set of maxims for our guidance in the very case before us.

Is not the "elective privilege as important" to my constituents as to any other people? Have they not, like yours, Mr. Speaker, and those of other Delegates here, need for a Representative? Have they no rights to be shielded, no interests to be watched after?

Sir, when the people of my district went to the polls, were they not there "in the exercise of their constitutional rights?" and did they not "go through with the process of the election according to the prescribed rules?" The committee admit all this. Why, then, (to apply the just sentiment of the committee of the Nineteenth Congress,) "should they be deprived of the advantages accruing therefrom?"

And then, if you say that the votes of those loyal men who could go and did go to the polls shall go for nothing, do you not disfranchise all the loyal men of the district "of representation for a long period of time"—at least until "this cruel war is over?"

And is there any doubt who received the greatest number of votes, and was, therefore, elected? The committee make no such pretension. I say, therefore, that, an election having been made, and the result having been ascertained beyond cavil, this House, on the principle of stare decisis, has no just authority to do anything but ascertain "on whom the choice has fallen," and that, consequently, it has no right to open the question of who was absent from the polls, or of the reasons of the absence.

I might here rest my case, and demand my seat on the precedent set for our imitation by our predecessors of a golden era. But, as a rule is to be set for all time; I cannot forbear to look for a moment, by way of contrast, into the soundness of the one commended to us by the present committee, of inquiring into the number of absentees and the causes of absence, as a means of ascertaining the popular choice. Can any one fail to perceive that this modern rule—one of the offsprings of this hated rebellion—is utterly unreliable? Sir, you must either require the whole vote of a district to be out or within reach of the polls, or you must take the majority of the votes cast as an exponent of choice, or you may not hit the choice. I will illustrate by two of the very cases referred to in the report of the committee as illustrative of the soundness of its position. First, the case of Mr. Clements, of Tennessee: Mr. Clements received in all the counties of his district 2,000 votes out of the usual vote of 6,000, one county, Warren, in rebel occupation, not voting. Now, who knows but that if this county of Warren had voted there would have been a majority against Mr. Clements? And so in the case of Mr. Hahn, of Louisiana: he received in his district 2,799 votes, all others 2,319, a difference of less than five hundred. But the parishes of St. Mary's and St. Martin's, being infested with rebel guerrilla bands, did not vote. Now non constat if these two parishes had voted, that Mr. Hahn would have been elected at all. The two parishes might have put the majority against him. And does not this show that the moment you begin to look into the matter of absent voters you may miss the object you aim at, to wit, the ascertainment of the popular choice, and that there is but one safe and certain rule, to wit, that which has been adopted by every State in the Union, of taking a majority or the greatest number of votes actually cast, without regard to absentees at all?

Sir, there is no other sound rule, and the proof of it is, that the moment you departed from the good old practice which has prevailed from the foundation of the Government until this rebellion began, of adopting the majority of the cast vote as the test of election, and relying on the official returns of the proper State officers as conclusive until fraud is alleged and proved, you involved yourselves in confusion, uncertainty, shifting decisions, and endless labor for your Committee of Elections, and the sooner you return to the old system the sooner you will place the elective franchise on the most respectable and the securest basis, and the sooner you will take from the Committee of Elections the stone of Sisyphus, which it has been heaving up the mountain from the first moment that this innovation on the elective principle and the old practice began.

My friend from Massachusetts, I know, will answer this argument and all others militating against his peculiar theory by saying that each House of Congress is the judge of the returns, qualifications, and elections of its members. True; and under that province this House may eject any member of the body, however legally elected, and there would be no redress except by another appeal to the people, and then another ejection might ensue, and so on, until a bare quorum would be left; so that this admitted function of Congress is to be exercised with a sound discretion, intelligently, rationally, honestly, not arbitrarily. Then, sir, holding this power by the tenure of sound discretion and not arbitrary caprice, ought Congress so to exercise it as to subvert one of the noblest principles of American freedom, and more especially when under our Federal system there can be no extinction of a State except in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, and when, of course, the principle of representation must survive wherever there is a loyal population to vote? And until Congress shall intervene and take charge of this whole subject of elections, as it may rightfully do, ought not the State laws and State usages to prevail and control? Ought not, at least, this small respect to be paid to State rights and State dignity? Ought you, in the absence of United States laws, to go behind the State laws and State returns? Resume, if you please, your rightful control over Federal elections, but so long as you leave this matter of elections to the States, respect them and the regulations which you yourselves invited them to adopt. And does not my friend from Massachusetts perceive that if we establish the modern practice of opening the whole subject of elections in each case without regard to State laws and State returns, there is danger that, in times of high party excitement and of demoralization, a broad margin may be left for political intrigue, and seats in Congress be given out and taken away by arbitrary party requirement? And does he not see the necessity, yea, the high policy, of not departing from the established precedents in this important matter of elections? Sir, in no interest of society is stability more necessary than in that of elections. Stability is indispensable there; and I will add that it is more necessary in reference to the elective franchise than it is to the institution of property itself, because the elective franchise is the source of the rights of property, and of every personal right, and not only the source, but the shield. I am looking ahead to the time when we may not have a Committee of Elections composed of as able and as honorable men as those of the present committee.

Now, I ask my friend from Massachusetts, in all respect, if this precedent of the days of yore—those pure and happy days of the Republic, the days of the second Adams, whose administration was a bright era of our land, and was as faultless and pure as that of Washington himself—is not one that comes to my relief on the present occasion, entitling me to a seat with him in this Hall? In the face of this precedent, can he do anything more than inquire whether I had, or had not, the majority of the legal votes cast?

But, sir, leaving this precedent out of view, are there no other precedents to entitle me to membership in this body? I marvel much, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee of Elections, while they were looking up the precedents and declaring that all precedent was against me, did not think of one of very recent origin, and perfectly in point, the case in the last Congress, of the unlucky individual whom you have so long kept out in the cold, my humble self. I can only account for the omission by the fact that I was so silent and obscure a member that gentlemen have actually forgotten that I was a member at all. And so, sir, I crave leave to refresh the recollection of the House, and to remind it (as the Journal will show) that I was a veritable member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and that I obtained my seat in the very teeth and in defiance of the very principle on which the committee now seek to exclude me, and on the very state of facts now existing. My friend from Massachusetts will say, I suppose, that his committee, being unable to agree, did not make report of the specific objection now taken, and so asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, leaving the House to decide the matter for itself. True, sir, but the committee reported the facts of the case, as in the present instance, leaving the House to decide the principle, and to apply it, without regard to any opinion of the committee, and the House did decide and apply it.

After stating that but three out of seventeen counties voted, and but one precinct in one of those three, the committee give the following results:

Total vote cast.....	1,018
For Joseph Segar.....	559
For Arthur Watson.....	438
All others.....	21

Making my majority over Watson 121.

In the present case the committee report twenty counties as composing my district, and a vote in four counties only, as follows:

In Accomac.....	1,120
Northampton.....	305
Elizabeth City and York.....	242

Total number of votes..... 1,667

Of these Mr. Segar received about 1,300 votes.

The only material difference is that in the first election seventeen counties composed the district, and only three voted; while in the late election twenty counties, under the new apportionment, formed the district, and only four voted. So that there is no substantial difference, in principle, in the two cases.

True, the addition of three counties to the district increases its population, but that addition is more than offsetted by the increase in the aggregate vote cast and the increase of my own vote in the last election over the first.

The able chairman of the committee will argue, I can foresee, that this case of mine is not a precedent. He will tell you that when it was up in the last Congress he declared that the House might, without interfering with any position of the committee, either admit or reject me. But I hold it to be indisputable that the House in admitting me did so either as matter of personal compliment or on principle.

But it could not well have been on personal compliment; for I suppose that it is my hard lot to be one of the least popular members that ever sat in this body. That, however, is more my misfortune than my fault; for an excessive infirmity of vision, besides giving me an appearance of almost clownish awkwardness and a seeming stiffness, much disqualifies me for recognizing faces and associating faces and names; and so, sir, I am debarred the pleasure of an extensive acquaintance with the members of the House, which I deeply regret, for I know I am socially and personally much a loser by the exclusion inflicted by this infirmity.

So the House must have voted on principle, and not on mere compliment. Well, sir, all I have to say is, that if you voted on principle, stand by it, for principle is a thing to be stood by; and if you voted for me for compliment's sake, please pay me the compliment once more, for I am as worthy now as then. The objection, then, that is taken to my admission now is the identical one that was in the mind of the House when I was admitted in 1862, and which, by my admission then, was expressly overruled by a conclusive vote. Nay, more. My case is far stronger now than it was then. Then, but 1,018 votes were cast in my district; now, there are near 1,700. Then, I received only 559 votes; at the late election, 1,300. So that while you gave my district a Representative with a vote of just 1,000, you propose to deny it one with a vote of 1,700; and while you awarded me my seat when I had only 559 votes, you talk of rejecting me when I received 1,300!

Now, sir, I do not mean to say whether consistency is a jewel or not, or whether it is a rare jewel, or one worth keeping bright; but this I do aver, that my case was decided, and I think rightly decided, when, on the 6th of May, 1862, I was admitted a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, because then there could not have been a single conceivable objection to my admission but the one now urged—that the whole vote of my district was not in reach of the polls. And I maintain, further, that the faith of this House is most solemnly pledged to yield me and my constituents the seat we claim. You cannot reject me without breaking your faith. Declare me elected to one Congress and rule me out of another, when the principle is identical, and the facts even stronger in the last case than in the first! Is that the way you keep sparkling the jewel of your faith? Is that the way this honorable body, the representative of the morals of the nation, cherishes its consistency and its honor? Is this the example the law-makers of a great and proud nation are to set to the citizen masses? Invite me, on the faith of your past action, into a most laborious and expensive canvass, and then turn me adrift, to be the sport of the envious and malicious, and an especial object of confederate taunt! Sir, I trust this House will bring upon itself no such reproach. Let it be just to itself and just to me, by reinscribing my name on the list from which the late Clerk so improperly struck it off.

But is there no other precedent of the same purport? Why, sir, my friend from Kentucky, Mr. Casey, was allowed to take his seat in the Thirty-Seventh Congress with about seven hundred votes, just about half of my vote; and when, as we are assured by an honorable gentleman now a member from that State, [Mr. SMITH], that a considerable portion of Mr. Casey's district was held by rebels, and could not reach the polls. How is it, Mr. Speaker, that you "make fish of one and flesh of another?"

I could bring up many other instances of gentlemen reaching the honors of this floor who received a very inconsiderable proportion of the votes of their districts, but I have cited examples enough to show that when the committee said that the precedents are all against me they were decidedly wrong. I insist that precedent, both old and new, time-honored and recent, lights my way to a seat in this body, as plain as the road to the parish church. Indeed, after the vote of the last Congress in my favor, the question of my admission is not now an open one. On the principle of stare decisis it cannot be reopened. To all intents and purposes it is res adjudicata.

But a large portion of my district being in rebel possession, and not voting, the committee argue that I cannot be said to be the choice of the loyal voters of it, for (may be) if the loyal men in the counties in possession of the rebels had voted I might not have had the majority. How did the committee ascertain that there are any loyal men in that portion of the district which is in the rebel lines? How do they know that there is one single loyal man there? The presumption is that there are no loyal men there. When a portion of a State rests under rebel rule, civil and military, the presumption of common reason is that all its people, or certainly most of them, are rebels; for if they prefer the Government of the Union to the rebel government why have they not left the one and sought the other? There is not a county of my district that is not in easy reach of the stars and stripes; and there is not a loyal man in any one of those counties that could not in a few days put himself within the Federal lines and the protection of the United States. Why have they not left rebeldom and sought protection under the old flag? I, for one, fled from the one and sought the other. I had made up my mind, immovably, that I would under no circumstances live under treason's government; and so I fled from the very heart of rebeldom, and fled, and fled on, until I caught sight of that glorious flag which is power and strength and protection wherever its proud folds are flung to the breeze. If there are any loyal men in the rebel-held portion of my district why did they not, as others did, "come out from among the wicked?"

The argument, then, of the Committee of Elections, that I am not entitled to my seat because there was a greater portion of the loyal men in the rebel part of the district than in the loyal part of it, is based altogether on a naked assumption. They do not state an ascertained fact, but put forth only an airy speculation. They assume what they ought to prove. They forget that the onus probandi is on them. I come here, sir, with a proper certificate of the proper returning officers of my State, which raises at once the presumption that I had all the votes necessary, both in quantity and quality, to elect me; and I come here also with the presumption in my favor that all those in rebel lands are rebels; and yet these presumptions, these most rational presumptions, to the benefit of which I am entitled as against any contestant, and indeed against all the world, until legitimately repelled, are to be rebutted and set aside, how? By facts and proofs? No, sir, by another and an inferior, less rational presumption—by a naked speculation!

Now, sir, I am not much of a lawyer, but I did learn this principle in the elementary law-books, that where a presumption arises in favor of a party, that party is entitled to the benefit of it until it is rebutted and the contrary made to appear. Now, I ask, in all candor, have the committee fairly and squarely rebutted the presumptions with which I come here in my favor? I am here, as I just said, with the presumption, first, arising from a proper certificate of election, that I had all the votes necessary to elect me; and I am here with that other most rational presumption, that in a rebel land there are but few loyal men to break the monotony of treason's song; and how, I ask again, do the committee rebut these presumptions and take from me the benefit of them? Why, sir, by the bold and bald assumption that as there were 1,700 loyal votes in the counties that did vote, there must be a proportional number of loyal men in those that did not vote! And having settled the basis of the proportion, they work it out, by the principles of Cocker and Pike, that as there were 1,700 loyal votes in the voting counties, there must be at least 5,100 in the counties in rebel possession and not voting! There are (to put the argument in semi-syllogistic form) 1,700 loyal votes in the four counties within the Federal lines that voted: ergo, there are 5,100 in the sixteen counties in the rebel lines that did not vote!

On what principle is it that the committee make the loyalty of the four counties that voted the basis for calculating the loyalty of the sixteen counties that did not vote? The circumstances of the two are totally different. The counties of Accomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, and York early came back within the blessed scope of the Union. The proud emblem of our national sovereignty and power, as it streams from the liberty-poles at Fortress Monroe, and Fort Wool, and Camp Hamilton, and Yorktown, and Williamsburg, can be seen by the naked eye of the people of the counties of Elizabeth City and York as each fold flutters in the breeze. The two large counties of Accomac and Northampton, in six months from the date of Virginia's secession, came, by the expedition of General Dix, within the protection of the Union, and at once acknowledged its supremacy. Not so with the rest of the district. The Federal arms had made no lodgment there. Practical protection had not been guaranteed or offered. The stars and bars, not the stars and stripes, floated there, and there rebellion and treason still their vigils keep. Now, sir, in such entire dissimilarity of circumstances, how can you reason from the loyalty of the people in the protected, loyal portion of my district, to the loyalty of those in the unprotected, rebellion-bound portion of it?

Five thousand one hundred loyal voters in the portion of my district in occupancy of the rebels! Sir, I wish in all my heart it were so. It would be imperium in imperio. It would be a power in that section more potent than the power of rebellion itself—a power that might “beard the lion in his den.” It would put the Union party there a long way ahead of the secession traitors. In the whole of this portion of my district, the entire vote in the presidential election of 1860 was 7,840. The loyal vote in it now, say the committee, is 5,100. So that according to the committee's reasoning it has 2,745 more loyal than disloyal voters—a thing which cannot be predicated of any congressional district in Virginia. The same reasoning, as I have ascertained by actual calculation, would make the number of loyal voters in the whole State 54,400, and of the disloyal 44,019, thus making the loyal vote greater by 10,381 than the disloyal; a result which will, I am sure, expose to the chairman of the Committee of Elections the entire fallacy of the calculations on which he proposes to oust his friend from Virginia from a seat beside him. Five thousand one hundred loyal voters in the most “copperhead” region of the whole State! Sir, I tell you, in all candor, that the counties outside the four that sent me here, are the very last locality in my State to find loyal people in. It was in the soil of those counties that Mr. Calhoun sowed broadcast those seeds of nullification and sectionalism which have ripened into a fruitful harvest of rebellion and treason. I have often heard it remarked, and the remark was but too true, that there were more disciples of the Calhoun faith in the first congressional district of Virginia than in all the State beside. I know it to be so. I was often the Whig elector in that district, was the representative of a portion of it in the State Legislature for more than twenty years, and I speak from personal knowledge when I say that there has been from the time of Mr. Calhoun's celebrated Fort Hill manifesto in 1831, less attachment to the Union of these States in this than in any other portion of the Old Dominion. It has been a soil more fruitful of a dividing and alienating sectionalism and of disunion-doctrine than any in this whole land, except peculiarly traitorous South Carolina. Look at the antecedents! Sir, when I knew the district, it was represented in Congress by old Burwell Bassett, a politician of the extreme State-rights faith. Soon after came Richard Coke, an ardent nullifier, whose Magnus Apollo was John C. Calhoun. Next came Henry A. Wise, who ran against Mr. Coke on the avowed ground of secession against nullification—the secessionist against the nullifier. True, Mr. Wise redeemed himself not a little in the dark times when executive prerogative in the hands of Andrew Jackson was laying foul hand on the most sacred principles of the Constitution. He gallantly stood up for the “union of the Whigs for the sake of the Union.” He even said that “office could not add a cubit to the stature” of Henry Clay—a tribute as righteous as beautiful, and that will be echoed back by the wise and the good of the world “to the last syllable of recorded time.”

But alas! Mr. Speaker, quam mutatus ab illo! Mr. Wise relapsed and beat badly Hill Carter, a gentleman of the olden standard, and an uncompromising old-line Whig of the Henry Clay and Daniel Webster school. I shall be no further his historian, but bring to your notice his successor, Thomas H. Bayly, a man of noble parts of both heart and head, but of extreme State rights and southern proclivities, and one of the most enthusiastic admirers of Mr. Calhoun. He was succeeded by a gentleman well known to many members of this body—Muscoc R. H. Garnett, whose political notions were at war from his boyhood with all national statesmanship, who regarded a labor to subvert our blessed Union a labor of patriotism and of duty, and who, since his pernicious doctrines eventuated in fragmenting that noblest fabric of human workmanship, held a seat in the rebel congress. From such antecedents, Mr. Speaker, you can scarcely expect to find in a certain part of my district the army of Union men which the Committee of Elections have so kindly assigned to its custody. Why, sir, even the old-line Whigs of the western shore portion of my district have forgotten their instincts. The Critchers and the Lewises and the Saunderses and the Smiths and the Roanes and the Lacys and the Carters and the Wilcoxes and the Shields and the Howards and the Greshams and the Claptons and the Fleets, and hundreds of the like quondam politics, who shouted for “Tippecanoe and Tyler too,” who sprung every nerve to make President noble, magnificent, immortal Harry Clay, who admired Daniel Webster as an intellect that any country might be proud of, who looked upon Millard Fillmore as one of the most unselfish, most patriotic, and most sagacious statesmen that the North has ever given to our common country, and who “did yeomen's service” in the cause of Bell and Everett at the last presidential election as being par excellence the Union ticket; all these, and thousands of others, the very elite of Whig chivalry in district No. 1, have gone off on “the pride of former days.” They “kept step to the music of the Union,” and sang anthems to the Union while Virginia and the Union were together, but now the harp of Tara sleeps on Tara's walls. Roused by the bugle-blast of their native land, they have thrown away the clarion with which they were wont to ring out joyous notes for the Union of their Washington. Sir, there never was a class possessing in reference to their State—their natale solum—more of the Cavalier spirit than do, my old comrades, the old-line Whigs of Northumberland and Lancaster and Richmond and Westmoreland and King George and Essex and King and Queen and Gloucester and Matthews and King William and Middlesex and Caroline and James City and Williamsburg and New Kent and Charles City. They loved the Union while their State and the Union could go on harmoniously together; but when conflict came, they became clannish, and, taking a position for their loved Old Dominion, they soliloquized, each to himself, in the language of Roderick Dhu's resolve:

“This earth shall fly

From its firm base as soon as I.”

And hence it was that, without reference to old party, they united almost to a man in ratifying the secession ordinance of their State.

Why, sir, all the blockade-running and carrying of supplies to the rebels from across the Potomac takes place through the very heart of the non-voting portion of my district. Could this contraband passing and traffic be well carried on if there were scattered over it 5,100 loyal voters? The two recent raids upon that land of submissive loyalty, the eastern shore of Virginia, emanated from the county of Matthews, one of the non-voting counties, and in which I do not believe there is one loyal man or woman. And throughout the western shore portion of the district a merciless conscription has sent nearly the whole of the arms-bearing population to the camp and the battle-field.

Sir, I am not singular in these opinions. In confirmation of them I submit a recent letter from Hon. E. P. Pitts, the able and loyal judge of the eastern shore circuit:

“Yours, asking my opinion of the loyalty of the counties of the first congressional district of Virginia, or that portion of it in rebel possession, has been received. I have resided in that district all my life, and have not been an inattentive observer of public affairs. I do not believe there are one hundred loyal voters in the portion of the district to which you allude, and if there is one he is unknown to me. That district has been under the control of the Calhoun school of politicians, and there are secessionists in it—and that not a few—of thirty years' standing. It would be surprising if there were many loyal votes to be found there, at least till under Federal control.”

Confirmatory of Judge Pitts's opinion is a letter from T. R. Bowden, Esq., a son of the late Senator Bowden, and Attorney General of Virginia, which I beg to read to the House:

NORFOLK, VIRGINIA, April 6, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 5th instant, asking my opinion of the strength of the loyal vote of the first congressional district of Virginia, has been received. In reply, I have no hesitation in stating that I believe the county of Accomac comprises nine tenths of the loyal voters of the district, excepting the county of Northampton, in regard to whose loyalty I am not advised.

My reasons for this opinion are based upon the following facts:

1. That in the county of King and Queen every vote cast was given for Dr. Richard Cox, the unconditional secession candidate, who voted for the ordinance of secession in the Richmond convention from “first to last.” In this county I am very well acquainted, my mother being originally from it. It polls 600 votes, and I have not been able to hear of the first loyal man residing there. Essex county, adjoining, is in the same way. Matthews and Middlesex comprise another district, which sent delegates to the Richmond convention. Mr. R. L. Montague (now member of the rebel congress) was almost unanimously elected to represent them. There were but two who voted against him; one of these died in Salisbury prison, and the other is now confined in Richmond.

Gloucester county sent Mr. John T. Seawell to the convention. He was one of the original secessionists. Gloucester has not three Union men in her borders. Save the military, I doubt if there be one. My father was attending court in that county when the news came that “Virginia had seceded,” and, being a notorious Union man, left the county in great haste.

On the Peninsula (with the exception of three who reside near Williamsburg) I do not know a Union man who presses its soil. There may be a few, but it strikes me they would have all left when McClellan evacuated the Peninsula, knowing the imminent danger they were in.

In regard to the counties in the northern neck, I am not personally acquainted, but am satisfied from reports that they are equally as destitute of any Union sentiment as those I have mentioned. They did not poll forty votes against the ordinance of secession.

In conclusion, I would remark that the first congressional district of Virginia is notoriously ahead of all others in devotion to secession. It furnished more original secession delegates to the Richmond convention, voted more unanimously for the ordinance of secession, and has given a more uniform, hearty, and zealous support to the rebellion than any other in the State.

These are my views; I give them frankly and unreservedly. If you deem them of any service, you are at perfect liberty to use them.

Very truly, yours,
THOMAS R. BOWDEN.

Hon. JOSEPH SEGAR.

And a prominent citizen of Lancaster county, William N. Harris, Esq., who left that county because it was no place for a Union man to live in, assures me that scarcely a Union man is to be found in the whole northern neck of Virginia.

Now, I ask my friend from Massachusetts how he expects to find among such a people, at this hour of peculiar estrangement, 5,100 loyal voters? Sir, “you may call spirits from the vasty deep, but will they come?” The 5,100 loyal men are not there. They exist only in the fabulous comparisons of the committee. Instead of that large number, I am satisfied there are not 250 loyal men in all that portion of my district that failed to vote at the late election. I do not mean to say that there will be no returning loyalty there, for I am persuaded that when our armies shall have possessed this region so that those who shall return to their homes may have assurance of security, thousands of the small farmers and mechanics and working men will, as it was in the counties of Elizabeth City and York, joyfully wend their way back to the hearth-stones they love. But at the time of the late election, I know I do not err when I say that not 250 loyal men were there to vote. But say there were 500, or 800, and still it will be manifest that I received a majority of the loyal votes of the whole district; and a majority of the loyal vote, as I understand, is all the committee require.

Now, sir, I appeal to my friend from Massachusetts if I have not made good my position, that, on the principles of his own report, I am entitled to a seat in this body. Let it be borne in mind that the Committee of Elections do not require me to have received a majority of the entire vote of the district. They do not estimate for the disloyal voters, for disloyal men are not expected or allowed to vote. The military power has been even used to exclude them from the polls. All that is required of me, I repeat, is to show that I received a majority of the loyal votes of the district; and I submit it to the House if I have not so made it appear.

But, sir, concede that there are the 5,100 loyal votes assumed by the committee, and I contend that on all principle, and in all reason, I am to be credited with that entire vote, just as much as if it had been written down on the poll-books for me.

Mr. Speaker, in many cases in practical life, as in law, finite beings must act upon rational presumptions, because we cannot always have the solutions of fact. Now, sir, I hold that one of the most rational presumptions that the mind of man can conceive, is that those loyal men in my district who could not reach the polls would ratify the choice of their more fortunate brethren in loyalty who did reach them. Is there anything more consonant with reason, or, if you please, the instincts of the human constitution? Why, what do people ordinarily want a Representative for? Is it not to have their rights and interests looked after and protected? Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that in your absence some considerate person undertakes to attend to some important matter of interest for you—saves, for example, the sacrifice of your property—is it not the most rational supposition in the world that you would ratify the action of that considerate person, and give him your thanks besides? And is not this the very case between myself and the loyal voters who could not reach the polls, and more especially when what little capacity I may possess to serve them is as well known to every man in the district as the road to mill? Will not this be their reasoning: "Well, we couldn't get to the polls ourselves, but we are glad our loyal brethren elsewhere did get there to elect a good, loyal man to look out for us and help bring this unhappy war to a close?" If they would not so reason they would falsify all the instincts of our nature.

Sir, this presumption that those loyal voters of my district who could not reach the polls would approve, ratify, and even rejoice at the choice made by their more fortunate brethren who did is so strong, so rational, so instinctive that it ought to prevail, and I ought to have the benefit of it until by some popular loyal demonstration to the contrary the presumption is overturned. I appeal to the House if this is not legitimate logic.

Why call for positive proof that I am the choice of the loyal absentees, when, on every just principle, I cannot but be that choice? Mr. Speaker, I am as well satisfied of it as I am that death awaits all mortal flesh, that, if the truth could be ascertained, there is not one loyal voter in the whole of that portion of my district outside the Federal lines that would not accept me unhesitatingly as his Representative in Congress. And why deal in mere technicalities and non-essentials at this trying hour when the life of the nation is at stake? And why are we not taught by the enemy? They have in their congress senators and representatives from Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri, States that are not in the rebellion, willing, I suppose, to have aid from any and every quarter. Why will you deny us loyal men of Virginia the privilege of aiding you as far as we can in bringing this war of ruin and death to a close, and relieving the starlit banner of the Union over an undismembered land? We do not claim, sir, to be master-workmen, but we shall be content to do the best we can in our humble way. Maybe we can carry to the master-craftsmen the cement to reunite the disjointed fragments of a once magnificent fabric of liberty and Union.

It is not necessary (say the committee) that all the loyal men of a district should be at the polls to constitute an election. If they have an opportunity it suffices, because if, having the opportunity, they stay away, the doctrine of acquiescence holds. On this point I have to say that by an ordinance of the Wheeling convention passed in August, 1861, providing that the voters of any county may vote in any other county and at any precinct, a large number of the voters within the rebel lines in my district might have voted if they had had the will and the nerve.

But they were intimidated, or kept from voting by the fear of consequences, it is intimated. Be it so; but according to the ruling in the case of Biddle and Richard vs. King, if intimidation prevailed, and voters were kept back by intimidation, the votes thus lost are not to be taken into the account, and the result is to stand on the votes actually given in.

But concede that the whole loyal vote of the rebel portion of the district was kept off by intimidation or duress or coercion: does it follow that we of the loyal portion of the district who were not intimidated or coerced are to be disfranchised of our representation in Congress? A portion of the people of my district were intimidated from voting, or were under duress: ergo, those who were not intimidated, or not under duress, are to be stripped of their representative rights! Sir, I confess to no such doctrine, because there is no justice in it; because it is the punishing of one set of loyal men for the helpless misfortunes of another set of loyal men; and because, above all, it is ignored by one of the fundamental and most sacred maxims of Anglo-Saxon liberty, which ought to be dear to every American heart, because at America's Runnymede, Boston harbor, it lit the fires of that Revolution which blazed out into the broad, lustrous radiance of American independence and American freedom; and that precious, liberty-born, liberty-preserving, century-honored principle is, that there should be no taxation without representation.

Do you intend to call up from the grave to scorn you the hardy barons of Runnymede memory? Do you mean to dishonor the memory of John Hampden, and Algernon Sydney, and Russell, and Pym, of liberty-loving England; and of James Otis, and Uxenbridge Thacher, and Hancock, and the Adamses, and Franklin, and the Morris, and Patrick Henry, and Richard Henry Lee, and Laurens, and the great Washington, of our own country? Will you fling a slur upon the good name of those thrice-gallant spirits who took counsel together on Boston Common, and there invoking the God of nations to inspire them with resolution for their great daring, ran down to Boston harbor, and there threw overboard the tea which was the representative of British despotism, and the throwing overboard of which, as I have already said, kindled the fires of that Revolution which burst forth into a bright effulgence of American disenfranchisement and American glory? Are you going to perpetrate all this profanity, as you will be doing, by coercing my people to bear taxation, and a heavy taxation, without that first privilege of freemen of saying whether the tax is right, what should be its amount, and how imposed?

Mr. Speaker, do you suppose that the people of the Old Bay State, and of Virginia—for in that incipient wrestle with arbitrary power Massachusetts and Virginia stood shoulder to shoulder—care a straw about the twopence a pound on tea? Was there any practical oppression in it? Could not every tax-payer in the colonies have paid the tax without feeling it? What was it, then, that waked up Hampdens and Sydneys all over the "Old Thirteen," and brought the pigmy weakness of the colonies face to face with the giant power of the mother country? What was it but elevated devotion to a great and priceless principle? And shall we so shame our glorious origin, have we so soon become so degenerate as to spit upon this most cardinal, this corner-stone principle of freedom's Magna Charta? Sir, a people that gives up such a principle, that does not fondly cling to it, even amid the throes of revolution, cannot long be free. Sooner or later they will pass under the yoke. Slaves they will be, and slavery they will richly merit!

Mr. Speaker, I can conceive no possible exigency to authorize the subversion of the great principle of representation. While a remnant of loyalty is left, and until our federative system is utterly swept away, it should live as a thing too precious to let die. I acknowledge that in times of war great principles must sometimes yield to the public necessities, (though the necessity must be honest and overwhelming;) but the necessities even of war can never call for the suspension of the right of representation in a popular Government, because it is a right of the vital essence of freedom, and the surrender of it is the virtual dissolution of all Government itself, and a remission, not to tyranny only, but to absolute despotism. There can be no safety for life, liberty, or property.

But let me submit this point in a practical view. I have before me a letter from Mr. Donn, the principal assessor in my district, which furnishes me with the Federal taxation which is imposed upon just three of the voting counties of my district:

In Accomac.....	$7,691
In Northampton.....	3,282
In Elizabeth City.....	7,923
For incomplete assessment.....	1,000
	<hr/> $19,876

There, sir, you have it in figures! Near twenty thousand dollars tax per annum under your internal revenue laws, all of which has been actually paid in, and cheerfully paid; and yet I am told that the people who pay this heavy taxation are not to have a Representative on this floor! Sir, I trust the House will not subject my good constituents to so unjust and humiliating a discrimination. I invoke for them the intervention of my friend from Massachusetts—a Representative of that noble State that gave birth to the dauntless patriots who threw the tea overboard in Boston harbor. Why cannot my friend be as generous to the loyal people of my district as he was last year to the loyal people of Louisiana, when they sent Mr. Flanders and Mr. Hahn here, and when the chairman of the Election Committee so zealously pleaded for their admission? I quote from the committee's report on that occasion. After urging, most strenuously, that the military governor had the power to order an election, the report says:

"The constitutionally elected Governor of Louisiana had turned traitor, and refused to discharge his constitutional obligations. What were the loyal voters to do? Were they to turn traitors also, or be disfranchised?"

I ask, in all deference, and in the committee's own language, "what are my poor constituents to do?" Are they to "turn traitors also, or to be disfranchised?"

And the committee say again:

"The Constitution imposes upon the United States this obligation:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them from invasion; and on the application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

"Representation [the committee go on to say] is one of the very essentials of a republican form of government, and no one doubts that the United States cannot fulfill this obligation without guarantying that representation here. It was in fulfillment of this obligation that the army of the Union entered New Orleans, and drove out the rebel usurpation, and restored to the discharge of its appropriate functions the civil authority there. Its work is not ended until there is representation here."

Mark the language, Mr. Speaker!

"Its work is not ended until there is representation here!"

Now, all I ask is that this constitutional and generous logic be applied to the loyal voters of my district as it was to the loyal voters of the first and second districts of Louisiana. The armies of the Union have, in that portion of my district, "driven out the rebel usurpation" and restored the civil authority there. But, sir, let me remind you, in the language of your committee, that your "work is not ended until there is representation here."

The committee further say:

"Are these people [the people of Louisiana] to wait for representation here until their rebel governor returns to his loyalty and appoints a day, or is the Government to guaranty that representation as best it may?"

I beg to submit the same questions about the people of my district. Are we to go without representation until "Honest John Letcher" or "Extra Billy Smith" returns to his loyalty and helps to rehoist over his State the old flag, or until Jefferson Davis and his wicked accomplices lay down the arms of treason and rebellion? Or, rather, ought not the "Government to guaranty to us representation as best it may?" That is the idea, Mr. Speaker. Representation in some form or other—in the best form you can! Do for us the best you are able—"guaranty it to us as best you may," and we shall be satisfied.

Mr. Speaker, forbear this invidious discrimination against my constituents. Give us representation, or tax us not. And I call upon my friend from Massachusetts, the moment I am ejected from a seat here, to rise in his place and vindicate a great principle, and his own consistency and the consistency of the House, by offering a bill to relieve the people who sent me here of all Federal taxation.

I am now to consider the last, and, I suppose, the most formidable objection to my admission, though, I am happy to say, it has not been raised by the Committee of Elections, and I presume, accordingly, has not its sanction. It is urged in some quarters that we have no State. It was argued in the debate in the Arkansas case that a "State should exist with a government." And I know well that some gentlemen on this floor entertain that most extraordinary idea that there is no such political organization as the State of Virginia. Well, if that is so, most certainly I can have no right to come here as a Representative from Virginia. But is it so? I think not. Sir, there certainly was once a State of Virginia. What has become of her? Has she gone up to the clouds? Has rebellion swallowed her down and abrogated her political existence? I hold, Mr. Speaker, that as a State she is, under our system of government, indestructible; once a State always a State, until let out by the three-fourths vote, or until successful revolution and general international recognition shall have animated into being a new nationality.

But so long as we profess to be governed by the Federal Constitution, we cannot extinguish a State. You may by arms subdue the people of a State to obedience to the Federal laws, and to their primary allegiance to the Federal Union; but you cannot, without violating the Constitution, and giving up the whole theory of our system and the whole theory of the rebellion, extinguish the State organization, because a State, in our system, occupies relation to, and is indeed part and parcel of, the Federal Government, and is subject to and to be governed by the Constitution of the United States as the supreme law. And on this principle Virginia is yet an existing State, and I think I can make it apparent to the House in a very few words.

The Constitution expressly provides, and it is one of the wisest provisions in it, because, without it, the Government of the Union would not last a lustrum, would have been a rope of sand, a helpless organization without the power of self-preservation; I say the Constitution provides that it shall be in no respect changed without the concurrent assent of three fourths of the States that formed it, or subsequently became parties to it. So that Virginia is still a member of the Union, owing primary allegiance to it, until she shall have been let out by the regular action of three fourths of her sister States. Now, sir, would not the making of the number of States one less in number be a change, and a radical change, in the Constitution? Would it not be a destruction, pro tanto, of the Constitution, the knocking away of one of its pillars? And if you can, without the joint action of three fourths of the States, knock away one pillar, may you not knock away another and another, until the whole fabric shall have fallen into ruins? I say, therefore, that if you cannot "dot an i or cross a t" in the Constitution without having the consent of the constitutional majority of three fourths of the States, à fortiori, you cannot perform the momentous act of ending, at your will, the life of a State.

Virginia, then, is somehow or somewhere a State, and to us, her loyal citizens, whose interest it is to keep posted about her, it is no difficult task to find her whereabouts, and to explain how she came where she is. You will find her sitting in her qualified sovereignty and in her loyalty about eight miles off, down in Alexandria. There she has a Governor and a Lieutenant Governor residing, and her auditor, treasurer, secretary of State, and attorney general. There she had recently, in actual session, a convention to revise her constitution, and adapt it to the extraordinary posture of affairs induced by the rebellion. Very recently her Legislature was in regular session, and will shortly be again in extraordinary session. The people of the loyal counties that acknowledge this Government pay their taxes with punctuality and alacrity; and I am happy to inform the House and our rebel friends in Dixie that the treasury of this State, much as some people turn up their noses at her, is in a very prosperous condition—plenty of money, and not a very expensive government to maintain. It would be most fortunate for the rebel government if it could exhibit so flattering a balance-sheet, and I rather think that Uncle Sam himself might well be congratulated if his fisc were in so enviable a condition. She had some short time since two Senators in Congress; one, most lamentably, sleeps in a premature grave; the other still sits and votes in the other wing of the Capitol. She has her civil authorities, judges, magistrates, sheriffs, coroners, clerks, constables, and all the officers of a regular government, in full exercise of their respective functions. She has, then, all the external and apparent characteristics of a State; and the only other question that can arise in relation to her is, is she legitimately a State? Just as much so, in my judgment, as a man is a human being or a mule a brute.

Let history speak. Shortly after the old State, in evil hour, seceded from the Union, the people of the northwest who desired to live yet under the Union of their fathers, held a convention at Wheeling and put in operation what is usually known as the Wheeling government of Virginia, and more recently as the restored government of Virginia. This government originated in the irresistible necessities of the loyal men, who could not follow their State into the treason and ruin of secession, and it was founded on the idea that the loyal people of the State constitute the State, or the political power of the State. From time to time other counties than those of the northwest attached themselves to this new organization, and among them the four that did me the honor to depute me their representative here. In course of time West Virginia became a separate State, but the counties in eastern and Piedmont Virginia that did not belong, geographically, to that division, and that did not of course desire to become a part of the new State, adhered to the restored government, and such is their present position. If the Wheeling government was a legal one, so is the present government at Alexandria, because the latter is an emanation from and a continuation of the Wheeling government.

Then, was the Wheeling government a legal organization? Undoubtedly it was; and the argument is brief. Its legality rests on the high ground of a decision of the highest judicial tribunal in the land, the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the case of Luther vs. Borden, the celebrated Dorr rebellion case, the Supreme Court ruled that where there are within the limits of an already existing State two conflicting political organizations, that is the legal, rightful one, which is recognized by the Federal Executive. And the court decided (Chief Justice Taney delivering the opinion of the court) that when the recognition is officially made by an official act of the Federal Executive, there is no going behind it. President Tyler, by the act of proffering Federal troops to the Governor under the old charter government of Rhode Island, recognized the latter government (the Supreme Court say) as legitimate, and so it was ruled that the Dorr government was a usurpation and a nullity.

Now, sir, after the Wheeling government of Virginia was organized, the President of the United States recognized it in various ways. Through his heads of Departments he held official correspondence and business relations with Francis H. Pierpont, Governor of the State under the Wheeling organization. As Governor, the latter was called on for troops, and furnished the quota of his State.

The recognition by the Federal Executive was all that could be properly required, but both Houses of Congress acknowledged the new government as legitimate. The Senate admitted two Senators for it, though it embraced not more than one fourth the population and territory of the original State; and this House recognized it by admitting to this floor three Representatives, my friends Messrs. BROWN, BLAIR, and WHALEY.

So the Wheeling government, having been acknowledged by the Federal Executive, was a legal, constitutional government, and the present restored government, being a continuation of the Wheeling government, is equally rightful and lawful; and there I might dismiss the question. But I am unwilling to place the restored government on any mere inferential basis. I say that it has been specifically recognized by the President of the United States subsequently to the formation of the new State of West Virginia, and since the present restored government went into operation. To say nothing of other acts of recognition, Mr. Lincoln, in his amnesty proclamation of the 8th of December last, expressly recognizes all "loyal State governments that have all the while been maintained." Such a government is that of the restored government of Virginia. By him it is acknowledged a "loyal State government all the while maintained," and therefore he excepted it from his general plan of reconstruction. Perhaps I had better quote his words, and here they are:

"To avoid misunderstanding, it may be proper to say that this proclamation, so far as it relates to State governments, has no reference to States wherein loyal governments have been all the while maintained."

Most evidently the President had in his mind this very restored government of Virginia.

The case has been supposed in this House of a recognition by the Executive and non-recognition by one or both Houses of Congress, and then it has been asked, where will a State government be found? Sir, the answer is obvious. I hold that no recognition by either House of Congress is necessary. It is the Executive acknowledgment that stamps legality upon a State whose organizations conflict. Congress has no part nor lot in establishing the legitimacy. The Executive, and the Executive alone, can exercise the legalizing function. And when it does exercise that function, Congress itself cannot look behind the act done. It binds not only Congress, but every citizen of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, this restored government of Virginia is as legitimate as the old charter government of Rhode Island as against the Dorr government, and as legitimate as that of Massachusetts or New York. And I put it to my friend from Massachusetts, how is it that a State can have two Senators in Congress and no Representatives? If Virginia is not a State, how can she have Senators in Congress, and if, as a State, she is entitled to Senators in Congress, is she not sufficiently a State to be entitled to Representatives also, and to her electoral vote likewise?

Mr. Speaker, in the name of the Union, do not ignore our young and may be feeble government, by denying us representation in this body. We are not strong, sir, but we are none the less a State. Why, sir, the little State of Delaware, scarcely equal in territorial extent to a single county in Virginia, is, nevertheless, just as much a State as her empire sister, New York; just (to use the language of Vattel) as a "dwarf is as much a man as a giant, and the smallest republic as much a State as the greatest empire."

Sir, ought not our weakness to be even our protection? Suppose you see the brawny giant strike down to the earth the helpless dwarf. What emotion rises in your bosom but of execration of the cowardly act? And so, if the strong arm of this mighty Government shall fell to the earth this youthful State in her weakness, sweeping away her whole civil establishment, and substituting for it the chafing harshness of a pure military government, and thus depriving her of what the Constitution guaranties to every State, a republican form of government, what will be thought of us and said of us by the Christian nations of the earth? What will be our portion but an enlightened scorn? How will the thing read in history? Let the historian write it down: "Here was a State (it will be noted) that could not brook rebellion, and that set up for itself, to avoid the crime and penalties of rebellion, a nascent nationality struggling against treason, yet loving the old flag and clinging with fond devotion to the blessed Government which is the 'bright particular' conception of human statesmanship, and which made us the freest, the happiest, and the greatest people on the globe, promising to be the nucleus for a grand gathering of future loyalty, until the whole length and breadth of the Ancient Dominion shall be brought under the gentle sway of peace, and back to allegiance to the best Government on earth; and yet a State like this, with promises and prospects like these, was, in her helplessness, struck down by the crushing arm of the all-powerful Government of the United States!" Shall we write any such chapter in the history of our country? No, sir; let us, as the President of the United States has done, recognize her as a "loyal organization all the while maintained;" and let us take her in and keep her in, until her weakness becomes strength, and the song of redemption shall ring through all her ancient domain.

And I will venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that if it be really desired to bring back the "mother of States and statesmen," in all her ancient consequence, within the scope of reconstruction, you can in no way so surely accomplish the great desideratum as by preserving unharmed her restored government. It will be a sure nucleus for loyal formations. As the Federal armies advance and rear the standard of the Union, men who were forced into this cruel war against their will, and those that tire of it—having tasted its bitter fruits—and those who at heart sigh for the old flag and for peace, will hasten within the lines where they will find a double protection, the civil protection of their own accustomed municipal authorities, and the military protection of the United States. And I venture to express the opinion—and I do it very confidently—that the best possible system of reconstruction is that of restored State organization and gradual accretion. It will be far more effectual than the territorializing policy or the establishment of military governments. There is not in it the harshness, the alienation, the embitterment, the rending, the crush, the crash that will follow any system that waits for general subjugation before it is applied. Its operation will be gentle and soothing, because gradual and restorative; and under it the people will find themselves almost imperceptibly back at their homes, and almost unconsciously remitted to their local governments and associations, and to the blessings of the Union of their fathers. Just as the amputation of a limb under the sedative influence of chloroform: the surgeon's knife does its gashing work, and his saw its hackling, and the limb is off, and when the patient wakes up he feels no pain, and is unconscious that a limb is gone!

Mr. Speaker, we need no intervention of Congress to provide for us "a republican form of government." Spare us, we beseech you, all such graciousness. Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis! Sir, whatever call there may be for the guarantying of republican forms of government in other States, there is no necessity that the United States perform that office for us. We call not on Hercules for help. Our own shoulders are at the wheel. We have already a republican form of government—one far more republican than any that Congress is likely to assign us; for give us one when you will, it will be more or less a military government, and no military government can be republican. Gentlemen of this people's branch of Congress, spare this government to us! It is our own handiwork—the emanation of our own free will and choice—the creation of our own native people and not of strangers—a government grappled to us by the strong hooks of a thousand dear associations of nativity and home, and twice a thousand sweet memories, yet lingering around the broken vase, that will bid us look wishfully back to the stars and stripes, and "bring the light of other days around us." I invoke you again, Mr. Speaker, wrest not this our own cherished government from us! "Woodman! spare that tree."

Let us remember, unceasingly, one thing, that which should be written "in letters of living light" over the lintel of every American door and deep engraven on every American heart, that in this country governments spring from the people, not the people from governments.

And is it clear that Congress has any rightful authority to interfere aught with this government of ours? Can it interpose by virtue of its obligation to guaranty to each State a republican form of government? Mr. Madison, in the forty-third number of the Federalist, expressly declares that this obligation extends only to a guarantee against "aristocratic or monarchical innovations." Is there in our State government any aristocratic or monarchical feature? Have we any privileged classes, any titled nobility, any sceptered king? None. Then Congress cannot intermeddle. There is nothing to guaranty. As to us, it is functus officio. In this regard its "occupation is gone;" or, rather, it never had any.

And according to the same illustrious authority, having maintained continuously republican institutions, we have a right even to "claim the Federal guarantee." And this is just what we do. We demand your assurance of this our republican form of government. We claim protection, not extinction, at your hands. If you do not give us the protection you fail of your constitutional duty, and thrust us into revolution.

One more point and I have done. I am not unaware, Mr. Speaker, that whispers have been going around of my disloyalty. I am not unaware that calumny, guided by sordid meanness and black corruption, has essayed to "filch from me my good name" in this regard. I know it well. Villainy, sir, generally aims to cover up its footmarks, but sometimes, as if Providence were looking on to punish it, it does not put soil enough over to disguise them. In this matter I have trailed its tortuous track, and traced out all its dark doings. By letters clandestinely used in 1861 in this Hall—so clandestinely that I never got sight of them, though I did learn casually the base purport of them—it made its stealthy effort to prevent me from taking my seat in this body that it might be filled on a new election by one of the arch-conspirators, who is unworthy to unloose the latchet of any Union man's shoes; and from that hour to this this puppy villainy has been barking at my heels, never once halting at hypocrisy, falsehood, or fraud. But this I will say, no man of honor and truth, and no one himself truly and disinterestedly loyal, ever impeached my loyalty. And I must say, Mr. Speaker, that if I am disloyal I have a very strange way of showing it. I do not deny, sir, that I made an effort to go with my State. Following the instincts that bind us all to the land under whose sod the bones of our ancestors rest, and where loved kindred live, I did endeavor to find arguments to reconcile me to secession. It was the struggle of a not uneventful life. Sir, I saw the bark of my State as she was about to set out on her perilous voyage. There she was, "all in the Downs." I watched her as she left her moorings and neared the pier to take in her freight of human life, and I gazed on the eager throng as it pressed down to the pier.

Among the first to tread her decks was my own and only son—a noble boy, around whom had gathered the honors of the university of his State, but who, alas! yielded to that fatal infatuation that a citizen must go with his State, right or wrong. Another look, and two unbearded youths, fresh from the college hall, my orphaned nephews, loved and cared for as my own children, followed that son. I looked again, and there stepped aboard as magnificent a specimen of mortality as ever eye rested on. And beside him stood one of queenly mien, his beautiful wife, my own dear child. And clinging to the mother was her cherub boy. There they all were. The son and the nephews were there, Aeneas was there, and Creusa, and the boy Ascanius; but old father Anchises was not there. He stood upon the shore eyeing the flapping canvas, a struggle going on in his bosom which loosened the very heart-strings—a struggle which I pray God may never wring my soul again—an agonizing struggle between instinct on the one hand and conscience on the other—a struggle whether I should follow the most loved on earth or stand by my country. But, blessed be God! conscience triumphed over instinct. I loved the stars and stripes better than my own flesh and blood!

I disloyal, Mr. Speaker! I who have loved this Union from my boyhood; who have worshiped at its altars with as pure and deep a devotion as ever bowed down votary there; who (as I have said on other occasions) have all my life regarded the Constitution of the United States as "the best system of civil liberty that ever emanated from human hearts and human heads, and as the accumulated political wisdom of the world from the time of Magna Charta to 1789." Disloyal to that Union which (I have often said) is connected in my mind with a thousand, and twice a thousand, glorious associations; with the wisdom that conceived and the blood that cemented it; with our prosperity and strength at home and our power and glory abroad; with that gallant flag that flings out the stars and stripes of our great country on every ocean, lake, and gulf, and sea; with that renown which exhibits her unconquered on a thousand battle-fields; with all the bright glories of the past and brighter hopes of the future. Disloyal to a Union like this! No, sir, no!

"Tis slander;
Whose edge is sharper than the sword; whose tongue
Outvenoms all the worms of Nile; whose breath
Rides on the posting winds, and doth belie
All corners of the world: kings, queens, and States, Maids, matrons, nays, the secrets of the grave."

Mr. CHANDLER, (claimant.) Mr. Speaker, the last day of the last session of Congress a bill was passed which provided that in making up the roll preparatory to the organization of the next and each ensuing Congress the Clerk of the House should only place thereon the names of such persons as had credentials showing that they had been regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their respective States or the laws of the United States. At the meeting of this House the first day of this session, when the list of names prepared under this law was read, it was found that the Clerk had discharged his duty in a manner which, although doubtless quite satisfactory to himself, was very unsatisfactory to a large majority of the members. Whole States were left unrepresented. Oregon, Kansas, Maryland, West Virginia, and Virginia appeared not upon the roll. It was quite a puzzle then—I am not aware that it is a less one now—to know the rules by which the action of the Clerk was governed. It could not have been a desire to punish States that had confederate legislatures, for Louisiana, Kentucky, and Missouri, all of which were on the roll, had such bodies. As to the last two, they, to be sure, were as peripatetic as a tin-peddler's cart or a Methodist circuit rider; still they claimed to be legislatures. Nor was it because some of them were represented in the confederate congress. Louisiana, Kentucky, and Missouri were fully represented at Richmond. There was no question of State seal, for "my Maryland" had her great State seal affixed to the credentials of her members, while Louisiana, with a naïveté that was quite refreshing, gave as a reason for the absence of hers that it was forcibly kept in the possession of the public enemies of the State. The number of votes received by the respective members of the omitted States could not have been in question. To this day it is not known how many votes the Louisiana members received, but no one pretends that it was so large as the number cast for me, and I was the lowest on the list in this respect. Here, however, in justice to the Clerk, let me say that, surprised as I was and am at the conclusions at which he arrived, I have no doubt he was honest in them, and meant to carry out the law in good faith and with honest purpose.

Well, sir, the roll, such as it was, was read, and after a few questions had been asked and answered, a motion was submitted and carried that the names of the members from Maryland should be placed on it. Like motions, with like results, were submitted as to Oregon, Kansas, and West Virginia.

The following resolution was then offered:

"Resolved, That the names of Lucius H. Chandler, Joseph Segar, and Benjamin M. Kitchen be placed on the roll as Representatives from the State of Virginia."

The mover of that resolution I see not here. On him mortal eye will never look again. He is a shrouded sleeper in the cold and silent chambers of the dead. We had been schoolmates when I was but a small boy, and ere he had reached the first flush of manhood. Our preceptor, to use the New England term, was his brother—that brother whose life-blood was poured out at Alton. Owen Lovejoy was one of the few of my schoolmates of whom I always retained a vivid impression. He was studious, quick in the acquisition of knowledge, as self-willed as a grandam's pet, and with brains enough to make that will effective. It was no matter of surprise to me when I saw his election to Congress. The man was but the normal growth of the boy—the flower but the expansion of the bud—the autumnal fruit but the full development of the blossom of the springtime. We differed on many political questions. I do not remember to have seen him but twice since we parted at the academy. It is pleasant to me to remember now, knowing as I do how strong were his party ties, how ingrained and buried in bone-deep were his political opinions, and particularly his anti-slavery sentiments—for he ever heard “his brother’s blood crying to him from the ground”—that in submitting that resolution his eye brightened, and he seemed to feel a pleasure in aiding by voice and vote one whom he had known in the olden time, the long, long ago.

The resolution was tabled by 27 majority. Not having been admitted to our seats, we were sent before the Committee of Elections. That committee has made an adverse report as to us all. One of the three, Mr. Kitchen, has already received the consent of this House that he should retire to private life, and the question now submitted to your consideration is as to granting a like permission to the other two.

When I bear in mind that the Clerk decided against us, that this House by a decided majority ignored us, and that we have now to combat the report of a committee which, if for no other reason, by the character and ability of its members is entitled to large consideration, I cannot say “I bate not jot of heart or hope,” but I do say, I do not despair. I believe our claim to be legal and just, and that, if presented in anything like its full strength, it will not only deserve but will command success.

As the report in my case is brief, with the leave of the House I will read it:

The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Lucius H. Chandler, claiming a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the second district of Virginia, submit the following report:

That the second district of Virginia is composed of eleven counties, namely: Brunswick, Dinwiddie, Greenville, Isle of Wight, Nansemond, Norfolk, Princess Anne, Prince George, Southampton, Surry, and Sussex.

Mr. Chandler claims to have been elected on the fourth Thursday in May, 1863, the day fixed by law in the State of Virginia for the election of Representatives to the present Congress. Polls were opened on that day in nine places in Norfolk county, Portsmouth, and Norfolk, and the whole number of votes cast was 779, of which Mr. Chandler received 778. The committee have not been able to ascertain how many of these votes were cast at each of the several voting places, but have been informed that almost the entire vote was cast at the city of Norfolk. The conclusion to which the committee have arrived does not render it necessary to make certain this fact. No votes were cast or polls opened in any other county in the district, for the reason that all the other counties composing this district, except that of Norfolk, were either under the entire control and occupation of the rebels or so nearly so that no man could go to the polls in safety if any had been opened for the reception of votes. The following table, taken from the census of 1860, will show the population of the whole district at that time:

Counties.	Total population.	Whites.	White Males.	Colored population.
Brunswick.....	14,809	4,992	2,459	9,817
Dinwiddie.....	30,198	13,678	6,837	16,520
Greenville.....	6,374	1,974	972	4,400
Isle of Wight.....	9,977	5,037	2,510	4,940
Nansemond.....	13,693	5,732	2,838	17,961
Norfolk*.....	36,227	24,420	12,091	11,807
Princess Anne.....	7,714	4,333	2,226	3,381
Prince George.....	8,411	2,899	1,463	5,512
Southampton.....	12,915	5,713	2,790	7,202
Surry.....	6,133	2,334	1,101	3,799
Sussex.....	10,175	3,118	1,542	7,057
Total.....	156,626	74,230	36,879	82,396

From this table can be seen at a glance the proportion which the population of Norfolk county, when the election was held, bears to that of the whole district. The committee are of opinion that his case is governed by the principles adopted by them in their report in the case of B. M. Kitchen, from the seventh district in this State, No. 14, already sanctioned by a vote of the House, and also in their report No. 9, in the case of Joseph Segar, from the first district in this State, and that in no proper sense can the vote in one county be treated as the choice of the other ten counties prevented by the strong arm of the rebellion from expressing any wish at the ballot-box.

* In census returns, Norfolk county includes Norfolk city and Portsmouth.

The committee do not deem it necessary to repeat here the reasons there given for a conclusion founded on a state of facts so similar that they could discover no new principle involved. They therefore refer to the above-named reports for a more full exposition of the views of the committee upon claims of this character, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Lucius H. Chandler is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the second congressional district of Virginia.

The committee, by the way, are mistaken in supposing that almost the entire vote was cast at the city of Norfolk. A majority of the votes were polled in Portsmouth.

It will be perceived by the report that no question is made as to mode of election, credentials, or any matter of form. But as at the organization of the House some members thought the credentials were not properly authenticated, it may be well to say here that they are in every respect in conformity with the law of Virginia. The Constitution of the United States gives the Legislatures of the respective States full power as to “times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives,” reserving to Congress the right, at any time, by law, to “make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.” Congress not having exercised its “right,” the full power, in this wise, is with the State.

The only point made by the committee is as to the vote cast, taken in connection with the small portion of the district in which polls were opened. The report says: “the committee are of opinion that his case is governed by the principles adopted by them in their report in the case of B. M. Kitchen, from the seventh district in this State,” &c.

I shall not consume time by reading the report in the case of Kitchen. The principle adopted in that case is this: “that where the vote actually polled in any district is such a minority of the whole vote that it cannot be determined that the person selected by that minority was the choice of the whole district, and the absent majority were not voluntarily staying away from the polls, but were kept away by force, then no such selection, thus made, could be treated as an election.” At the first glance this principle appears sound, without blemish or flaw. It so seemed to me at the earliest reading I gave it. I am free to say I then deemed it conclusive against my claim to a seat. Upon a second reading I changed my opinion, and thought then, as I think now, that the proposition is but plausible and specious. It embraces two assumptions:

1. That the absent majority was kept away by force.

2. That that absent majority was composed altogether of Union men.

In discussing them, I shall reverse their order. As to the assumption that the absent majority was composed altogether of Union men: the numerical strength of that majority is arrived at in this way: the ratio of loyal voters in the counties that did not vote, it is taken for granted, was the same as in those that did. It is a simple question in the “Rule of Three.” If a population of so many thousands gave so many votes, how many would a population of another number of thousands give? With this basis of calculation, the Union vote in that portion of my district in which polls were not opened would have been 1,588, taking the whites only. In most cases the adoption of such a rule would probably be a proper one. Both my colleague and myself admit that with the light the committee had before them it was as to us every way fair. I think my district is an exception to this general rule, and that I can convince the committee that it is. A similar state of things exists as to the district of my colleague.

Three years have rolled round since the ordinance of secession was voted upon in Virginia; but three years as marked by the oscillations of a pendulum, the sands of an hour-glass, or the return of seed-time and harvest; but if measured by events, it has been an eternity, with an Iliad of woes. Since 1836, disunion doctrines, to a greater or less extent, had been promulgated in Virginia by the bar-room and cross-road politicians, and now and then by a member of Congress, but they did not become rampant until the presidential campaign of 1860. In the free States the supporters of Breckinridge were unquestionably as loyal as the members of any other party. It was not so in the southern States—certainly not so in Virginia. In that ever-memorable campaign the line between loyalty and treason was tolerably well defined. Every secessionist was for Breckinridge; and the converse of the proposition, that every Breckinridge man was a secessionist, was in the main true. There is an old Greek proverb, that “from a crow’s egg you can expect nothing but a crow.” A Union man expected from a Breckinridge man nothing but a disunionist, and in nine cases out of ten was not deceived or disappointed. All Democrats, however, did not support that ticket. A large number refused to be switched off the Union track. In my district these patriotic men were headed by a gentleman well known to many on this floor and to the country at large—one whose private character is as spotless as “the fanned snow,

That’s bolted by the northern blasts twice over.”

and whose public acts, as part of the imperishable history of his country, will ever do him honor. I refer to Hon. John S. Millson.

I was on the Bell and Everett electoral ticket, and received in the counties and cities composing my congressional district a plurality of 578 votes. The Union vote, including of course that thrown for Douglas, was 6,712. About 2,900 of that Union vote, or nearly one half, was cast in Norfolk county, Norfolk city, and Portsmouth. At the latter place was one of the largest navy-yards in the country. Before the breaking out of the war it had for years furnished a support to thousands. The most of the counties in the district are inland, and had but a small infusion of population from the free States. Norfolk and Portsmouth, on the other hand, were seaports, with a large number of that class. At the commencement of the war scores and scores of Union men left these cities, but returned after our forces took possession. The congressional election was held the fourth Thursday in May, 1863. These cities and Norfolk county had for a year been held by our troops. The other counties had either never been occupied by us or had been one day in our possession and the next in that of the confederates. Surely the victorious presence of the old banner with its stars and stripes, “symbols of light and law,” for a twelvemonth might be supposed to have had some influence.

In eastern Virginia the vote in favor of secession, in favor of breaking up the foundations of that Government which had been cemented by the toils, the tears, and the blood of our fathers, was very large. It is true that that unanimity did not indicate the real state of public opinion. Thousands of Union men did not vote at all; other thousands of Union men voted for the ordinance. The questions may be asked, “What became of the Union men who did not vote?” “How happened it that Union men could ignore their sentiments and vote for secession?” It is difficult to give to those residing in free States satisfactory answers to these questions. It does, however, seem to me that there is nothing so very strange in the state of things that transpired. Go into any community, north or south, east or west, and what is the proportion of men who have a genuine article of moral or physical backbone? In ordinary times, the “piping times of peace,” when sailing on the smooth surface of a summer sea, with the sweet south making soft dalliance with the sails, we get along well enough. The gutta-serena cartilaginous substance that composes the spinal column of so many of us answers a very good purpose. But when the “rains descend, and the floods come, and the winds blow,” there is a collapse.

One of the great evils of modern civilization is its destruction of individuality of character. Men not only move in masses but they think in masses, and are easily led away by novelty and excitement. In revolutions the leaders are bold and reckless. Many a conservative joins them through fear, and then, to avoid the suspicion of lukewarmness, goes further, and becomes more ardent than the original agitators. All French historians tell us that in the first French Revolution, when the lamp-posts bore such fearful fruit in Paris, and the gutters literally bubbled with blood, the mob was always in the minority could there have been a fair expression of opinion.

New converts make up in zeal what they lack in experience. It is one of the settled principles of human nature. This may be illustrated in a thousand ways. An Orful Gardner will be more zealous in prayers and exhortations than an old Christian. The members of the peace societies of twenty-five years' service are much fuller of fight than the veterans of a dozen battle-fields. A Whig, whether he rattled from honest convictions or because his nostrils quivered and expanded at the savory fumes from the flesh-pots, as a Democrat generally "out-Heroded Herod." If called upon to select an abolitionist of the first water, you would take neither Garrison nor Phillips, but would hunt up some one who was a proslavery Democrat at the last presidential election.

Add to all this, Mr. Speaker, the long time my district was in the hands of the confederates, the money every wealthy man was compelled to invest in the confederate cause, the fathers, brothers, sons, that were seduced or forced into the confederate army, the sympathies that naturally clustered about them, and the difficulty of discriminating between them and the cause for which they were in arms, and we can understand, I think, why some portion of Unionism was rooted out.

As I have already said, the vote in favor of the ordinance of secession was very large, nearly unanimous. The city of Portsmouth, however—"blessings be on her and eternal praise"—cast more votes against it than the balance of the district.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the members of this House, in view of facts to which I have referred, if they believe loyalty was as generally diffused throughout the district as it was in Norfolk county, Norfolk, and Portsmouth, and if the ratio, as established by the committee, is a fair one in my case? But if the assumption of a "Union vote of 1,588" be correct, does it follow that it would have been unanimous against me? Of the 779 votes actually cast I received 778. Is it unreasonable to suppose that as a Union man, tolerably well known in the district, I should have received some of the 1,588, particularly as I was the only candidate? Is such an inference in my favor a forced one? Would it require Mr. Shandy's coach horses with Obadiah in charge of the reins to draw it? If a "ratio" as to the person for whom the votes would have been thrown were to prevail as well as the ratio of the committee as to the number that would have been thrown, my proportion of the 1,588 would have been 1,586.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a proposition to the chairman. He was born in Massachusetts. I am of that ilk. We are "ambo Arcades," and although neither of us after speaking on this floor, for a few minutes even, could be considered as in good condition for singing, we, as Yankees, may be regarded as always ready for a trade. The only vote I did not receive at the congressional election in my district was cast for John Minor Botts. Now, sir, if the chairman will withdraw my case, refer it back to the committee, regard Mr. Botts as a contestant, and upon my withdrawing my claim, declare him entitled to the seat, I will take my hat and withdraw from this Hall quicker than Lot did from Sodom, although angels hastened him. I will do more. Lot's wife looked back. Not wishing to draw any invidious comparison between this House and one of the cities of the plain, I will agree never to look toward it again.

I now pass, Mr. Speaker, to the first assumption of the committee, "that the absent majority was kept away by force." For the purpose of the argument, I am willing to admit that it was thus kept away, and that but for such force it would have been as large as claimed. But I deny the correctness of the proposition, "that if an absent majority was kept away by force, then no such selection thus made could be treated as an election." With all respect for the committee, and for its chairman, who attends principally to the championship of their reports—and right ably does he discharge this duty—I think such a proposition unfounded in law, unsustained by reason, fatally dangerous in practice. Let me be understood. I am not combatting this principle "toto celo," but as it applies to the State of Virginia in the congressional election. Under certain circumstances the proposition is undoubtedly sound. If in time of peace the interference of the military, or if in time of war such interference by soldiers not hostile, but of our own troops, kept a majority from the polls, then I grant you the election would and should be void. What have been the allegations in this wise at this session as to Maryland and Missouri? Why, that Union troops, at the polls, by actual violence or intimidation prevented loyal American citizens from exercising freely, and without dictation, the great privilege of the elective franchise. In the Missouri case of Loan and Bruce, just decided by this House, it was not alleged that the military had endeavored to prevent an election. The charge was that they had endeavored to give a certain direction to the election. All the preliminary formalities of an election had been complied with. The polls were regularly opened, and every person duly qualified would have been permitted to vote, provided he had voted on the same side with the bayonets. It was not a denial of the right to vote, but a denial of any exercise of a preference as to the candidate to be voted for.

Interferences such as I have referred to might happen through the influence of party, or of the Government, but would be much more likely to occur from collusion between the military and one or more of the candidates. In whatever way these interferences took place, whether by the influences of which I have spoken, or by collusion, they should be frowned down, and trampled into the mire after they are down.

I hold the rule to be entirely different, if "the absent majority was kept away" by the presence of a foreign foe, or by domestic traitors banded together, not to prevent or control an election, but to subvert a Government. Am I mistaken as to this? Is the distinction I make a fanciful one? Let us state a case or two by way of illustration. The chairman of the Committee of Elections has no doubt heard and read of a serious outbreak that was known as "Shay's rebellion." It occurred in Massachusetts. The old "Bay State" has known what it was to nourish traitors. I do not know that the infected section embraced any part of the gentleman's district. If it did, it could have exerted but one kind of influence upon him—the strengthening his devotion to his country and her institutions. If, however, upon the day of election, at any time when the chairman was a candidate, three fourths or seven eighths of his district had been overrun, not by a mob merely, but by armed traitors such as were the men headed by Shay, and polls had been opened in only the remaining fourth or one eighth, and at those the gentleman had received a majority or all of the votes actually thrown, save one, would he have claimed his seat?

In 1814, during the war with Great Britain, her troops took possession of Castine and quite a portion of Hancock, and I think of Penobscot counties, in the then "district of Maine." They were in such forcible possession for some time. Did such armed occupancy break up congressional districts, make necessary new apportionments, deprive other portions of the districts, not pressed by the tread of a hostile foreign soldiery, of their rights to representation?

In that fearful fight at Gettysburg, where the trained columns of Lee went down before the brave boys of the army of the Potomac as the bearded grain goes down before the strong arm of the cradler, suppose he had been successful, a considerable portion of the State of Pennsylvania, for a shorter or a longer period, would have been overrun by graybacks. If a county or two in some of the congressional districts had escaped the dire visitation and held elections, would you have refused and rejected those whom they selected? Maryland, at one time, was subjected to the same risk. Kentucky and Missouri, to a greater or less extent, are in such a condition at this very hour. By the adoption of the rule of the committee you might deprive yourselves of a quorum.

Again, sir, it is not common justice to punish those who have not sinned. If a large portion of my constituents in Brunswick, and the other counties, the "Union majority" of the committee, did not and could not vote, it is their misfortune, not the fault of those who did vote. The former are not deprived of their rights because the latter obtain those to which they are entitled.

It will also be observed that there is a broad line of demarkation between the Missouri case, to which I have already referred, and the cases of my colleague and myself. If the report of the committee had been adopted, and neither Mr. Loan nor Mr. Bruce been admitted, a new election would have been ordered at once. The people of that district in Missouri would have been unrepresented so long only as would have been necessary to give the legal notice of such election.

In the case of Mr. Segar and myself the same state of things exists now in our districts as when we claim to have been elected. Ignore our claims, and our constituents must have no voice in this popular branch of the Government. No valid election can be had in either of our districts until our victorious arms shall have driven the traitors out.

If I have not maintained the position I took against the soundness of the proposition of the committee as to the "majority," and their "being kept away from the polls by armed force," I think it has been owing to no inherent weakness in the position itself, but solely to the lack of ability I have shown in defending or maintaining it. One word more, by the way, before I close this branch of the argument. The views of the committee would make it absolutely necessary to have an actual ascertained majority of the votes not cast as well as of those cast. The lack of one vote would be as fatal as the lack of a thousand.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman states that a minority of the voters of a district have the authority to elect a Representative. Now, I ask how small a minority may elect?

Mr. CHANDLER. The most forcible question that can be put. The gentleman is too good a logician not to know that the reductio ad absurdum is a most potent weapon in argument. I admit my principle would, perhaps, if carried to the extreme, give one person the right to elect. But on the other hand, that principle of construction which I laid down before the gentleman interrupted me—and here I will say the gentleman's interruption does not trouble me at all, because my life has been full of interruptions, not the least of which is the one thrown in my way by the gentleman himself—which was that an actual minority of one would have defeated me, and would, in some degree at least, place the gentleman in something of the same dilemma in which he seeks to fix me. Does the gentleman say that? If he does, then I say I think that one vote can elect. As a mere matter of law one vote can elect as well as a thousand. Electors are under no legal obligation to vote. They may if they see proper permit an election to go by default, and permit one man to return a Representative to Congress.

Let me put the case in another way. Every one who knows anything about West Virginia—and my friend on my right, one of the Representatives of West Virginia, [Mr. BLAIR,] understands a good deal about the by-ways and paths of that country—knows that at least in its earlier history, and the same rule holds good to a very considerable extent now, the roads were very bad. There were but few bridges, the branches were liable to rise, and the bridges to be carried away. The streams were generally crossed by fords, and these streams were so liable to be swollen by rains that a provision was early introduced into the statute-book providing that in case of heavy rains the sheriffs should have the right in the respective counties to adjourn the polls from time to time not exceeding three days. That same rule, I believe, still holds good to this day. Now, suppose that instead of rebels in arms, in the counties of my district that did not vote, the windows of heaven had been opened, and the rain had come down, equaling the first three days of the fearful rain which served the old world so badly, giving us a specimen—as the man said—of the water-cure, but the other way. If the voters had been thus prevented going to the polls, and I had received but the 778 votes which I did receive, would the gentleman from Massachusetts say in that case I was not entitled to my seat? I ask the gentleman that question, and I pause for an answer.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that when the statutes of Virginia contemplate such an exigency as that and provide for it, we might, governing ourselves by the statute, find an answer; that in the course of the three days it was to be hoped the clouds would expend themselves and the rainbow spread over the heavens.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, there is more smartness than fairness about that answer; but let us take the case where there is no such provision of the statute. What would the gentleman say to that?

Mr. DAWES. I should say it was a casus omissus.

Mr. CHANDLER. The gentleman knows very well that there is not a member of the Committee of Elections who would have dared to stultify himself in the presence of the House by introducing such a report as the committee has introduced in my case, where voters were kept away by heavy rain. [Mr. Dawes nodded assent.] He admits the proposition. Then, if the fact that voters are kept away from the polls by the act of God does not vitiate the election, let me ask him another question. I do not know what the gentleman's profession is, but I would bet my life he is a lawyer.

Mr. DAWES. Not enough to hurt me. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. But enough to hurt me seriously. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman does not seem to recognize the difference between the act of God and the act of the devil.

Mr. CHANDLER. The act of the devil is considered in law the act of the king's enemy—is it not? Did the gentleman in all his legal readings, either in a marine insurance policy, or in an elementary text-book, or in the decisions of our different courts, ever see the act of God mentioned that it was not, in ninety-nine times out of one hundred, coupled with the term "the king's enemies?" And it comes to precisely this, that if the voters are prevented by the act of God from being at the polls, then a small minority may elect. You may call heavy rain the act of the devil, and be somewhat sustained by Scripture which speaks of the prince of the power of the air. I assert that if the majority is prevented from coming to the polls by the act of God, or by the act of the enemies of the Government, then the absence of the majority does not destroy and make null and void the rights of the minority. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections whether that is not good logic and pretty good law and pretty good common sense; and whether it ought not, to some extent at least, to control the action of this House.

It has been said by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts that our admission will "establish a precedent to bind you how and by what method a title to representation upon this floor shall be established from all the other districts in the rebellious States." With all deference to the experience and matured wisdom of the gentleman, it will do no such thing. I must crave your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, in devoting some little time to the presentation of the peculiar position of Virginia, and the different ground she occupies from any other of the States which entered into the confederacy.

I approach the subject with feelings such as one might experience who stands looking into a newly dug grave, in which has been placed the loved and the lost, and hears the clouds strike the coffin-lid with their dull, heavy sound. April 17, 1861, the Virginia convention passed an ordinance of secession. That day dawned upon no State with fairer prospects. True, her advancement had not been so rapid as that of some of the manufacturing and commercial States. She was to a great extent agricultural. In the preceding decade her white population had increased one hundred and fifty-three thousand. She had two hundred and ten miles of canals, and in the same period had added thirteen hundred miles to her railroads. Her slaves were bringing higher prices than ever before. The influence she had wielded from the earliest history of the Government had not waned. The prestige she had acquired through a Lee, a Patrick Henry, a Madison, a Jefferson, and a Washington, was still operative. In all the slave and many of the free States she was the "Old Dominion" still. Her agricultural, manufacturing, and mineral capabilities were unsurpassed; and if, in the American sense of the term, they were slowly they were still surely being developed. Modest as is my colleague, I must here say no one had more to do with that development than did he. From her extreme eastern bounds that were lapped by the ocean's waves, to her furthest western peaks that kindled into blushes under the amorous glances of the setting sun, she was full of material prosperity, full of glorious promise. Moses, when from the Mount of Nebo, the top of Pisgah, the Lord showed him all the land of Judah unto the utmost sea, and the south, and the plain of the valley of Jericho, the city of palm trees unto Zoar, saw no fairer sight. When one contrasts her then condition with what it is now, sadness is succeeded by indignation. Desolation is running riot in her borders. Gaunt famine stares her in the face. Her sons have been more than decimated by hissing shot and bickering steel. Her soil has been wet with tears, drenched with blood, made billowy with graves. A miserere in one wide wail of woe has gone up from agonized hearts, such as rarely ever reverberated through the blue empyrean.

Those who have been instrumental in producing this condition of things, in changing the garden of the Lord into an aceldama, a field of blood, will have a fearful account to settle. In this world their names

"Will have a taint of infamy,
Which, like Iscariot's, through all time shall last,
Reeking and fresh forever."

In that world which is to come the language of Isaiah may well be applied to each of them: "Hell from beneath is moved for thee, to meet thee at thy coming."

But, as I have said, the ordinance passed by a considerable majority. The minority was in the main composed of the members from that part of the State now known as West Virginia, although I am happy in saying that the member from the stronghold of my colleague, the county of Accomac, that incorruptible man and sterling patriot, William H. B. Custis, and the members from Norfolk county and Portsmouth, (where I received a majority of my votes,) were true to the Union.

What was done in that portion of the State that remained unseduced? Did its citizens blench? Did they quail? Did they "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning?" No, Mr. Speaker, no. They knew from whence their blessings had flowed. They knew that the Union to them and to the country at large had been, not a Mount Ebal of curses, but a Mount Gerizim of blessings; that it had been as ennobling in its influences as "orient suns, which shine on barren sands till they breed jewels." They remained firm, true to the memories of the mighty dead, true to themselves, true to their posterity, true to their country, true to their God.

Three days after the passage of the ordinance, John Letcher telegraphed the mayor of Wheeling. I read the telegram of Letcher, and the answer:

RICHMOND, April 20, 1861.

To ANDREW SWEENEY, Mayor of Wheeling:

Take possession of the custom-house, post office, all public buildings and public documents in the name of Virginia. Virginia has seceded.

JOHN LETCHER, Governor.

WHEELING, April 21, 1861.

To JOHN LETCHER, Governor of Virginia:

I have taken possession of the custom-house, post office, and all public buildings and public documents in the name of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, whose property they are.

ANDREW SWEENEY,

Mayor of Wheeling.

This same spirit pervaded all classes in that northwestern section of the State. Ten days before the question of the acceptance or rejection of the ordinance was to be voted on, the 13th day of May, 1861, a mass convention met at Wheeling. From the irregular manner in which this convention was called, and its unwieldy size, it was not calculated for the dispatch of business. Its action, however, resulted in the call of another convention, which met at Wheeling, June 11, 1861. I ask the Clerk to read the declaration addressed by that body to the people of Virginia.

The Clerk read, as follows:

A Declaration of the people of Virginia represented in convention at Wheeling, Thursday, June 13, 1861.

The true purpose of all government is to promote the welfare and provide for the protection and security of the governed; and when any form of government proves inadequate for or subversive of this purpose it is the right, it is the duty of the latter to alter or abolish it. The Bill of Rights of Virginia, framed in 1776, reaffirmed in 1830, and again in 1851, expressly reserves this right to a majority of her people. The act of the General Assembly calling the convention which assembled in Richmond in February last, without the previously expressed consent of such a majority, was therefore a usurpation; and the convention thus called has not only abused the powers nominally intrusted to it, but with the connivance and active aid of the Executive has usurped and exercised other powers, to the manifest injury of the people, which, if permitted, will inevitably subject them to a military despotism.

The convention, by its pretended ordinances, has required the people of Virginia to separate from and wage war against the Government of the United States, and against the citizens of neighboring States, with whom they have heretofore maintained friendly, social, and business relations.

It has attempted to subvert the Union founded by Washington and his copatriots, in the purer days of the Republic, which has conferred unexampled prosperity upon every class of citizens and upon every section of the country.

It has attempted to transfer the allegiance of the people to an illegal confederacy of rebellious States, and required their submission to its pretended edicts and decrees.

It has attempted to place the whole military force and military operations of the Commonwealth under the control and direction of such confederacy, for offensive as well as defensive purposes.

It has, in conjunction with the State Executive, instituted, wherever their usurped power extends, a reign of terror intended to suppress the free expression of the will of the people, making elections a mockery and a fraud.

The same combination, even before the passage of the pretended ordinance of secession, instituted war by the seizure and appropriation of the property of the Federal Government, and by organizing and mobilizing armies, with the avowed purpose of capturing or destroying the capital of the Union.

They have attempted to bring the allegiance of the people to the United States into direct conflict with their subordinate allegiance to the State, thereby making obedience to their pretended ordinances treason against the former.

We, therefore, the delegates here assembled in convention to devise such measures and take such action as the safety and welfare of the loyal citizens of Virginia may demand, having maturely considered the premises, and viewing with great concern the deplorable condition to which this once happy Commonwealth must be reduced unless some regular adequate remedy is speedily adopted; and appealing to the Supreme Ruler of the universe for the rectitude of our intentions, do hereby, in the name and on the behalf of the good people of Virginia, solemnly declare that the preservation of their dearest rights and liberties, and their security in person and property, imperatively demand the reorganization of the government of the Commonwealth; and that all acts of said convention and Executive tending to separate this Commonwealth from the United States, or to levy and carry on war against them, are without authority and void; and that the offices of all who adhere to the said convention and Executive, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are vacated.

Mr. CHANDLER. Thirty-four counties, containing about one fourth of the whole white population of the State, were represented in that convention. It was necessary, in the opinion of the convention, that the State should be reorganized, and the following ordinance was adopted:

An Ordinance for the reorganization of the State government, passed June 19, 1861.

The people of the State of Virginia, by their delegates assembled in convention at Wheeling, do ordain as follows:

1. A Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and attorney general for the State of Virginia, shall be appointed by this convention to discharge the duties and exercise the powers which pertain to their respective offices by the existing laws of the State, and to continue in office for six months, or until their successors be elected and qualified; and the General Assembly is required to provide by law for an election of Governor or Lieutenant Governor by the people as soon as in their judgment such election can be properly held.

2. A council, to consist of five members, shall be appointed by this convention, to consult with and advise the Governor respecting such matters pertaining to his official duties as he shall submit for consideration, and to aid in the execution of his official orders. Their term of office shall expire at the same time as that of the Governor.

3. The delegates elected to the General Assembly on the 23d day of May last, and the Senators entitled under existing laws to seats in the next General Assembly, together with such delegates and Senators as may be duly elected under the ordinances of this convention, or existing laws, to fill vacancies, who shall qualify themselves by taking the oath or affirmation hereinafter set forth, shall constitute the Legislature of the State, to discharge the duties and exercise the powers pertaining to the General Assembly. They shall hold their offices from the passage of this ordinance until the end of the terms for which they were respectively elected. They shall assemble in the city of Wheeling on the 1st day of July next, and proceed to organize themselves as prescribed by existing laws in their respective branches. A majority in each branch of the members qualified as aforesaid shall constitute a quorum to do business. A majority of the members of each branch thus qualified, voting affirmatively, shall be competent to pass any act specified in the twenty-seventh section of the fourth article of the constitution of the State.

4. The Governor, Lieutenant Governor, attorney general, members of the Legislature, and all officers now in the service of the State, or of any county, city, or town thereof, or hereafter to be elected or appointed for such service, including the judges and clerks of the several courts, sheriffs, commissioners of the revenue, justices of the peace, officers of the city and municipal corporations, and officers of militia, and officers and privates of volunteer companies of the State, not mustered into the service of the United States, shall each take the following oath or affirmation before proceeding in the discharge of their several duties: "I solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof as the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution and laws of the State of Virginia or in the ordinances of the convention which assembled at Richmond on the 13th of February, 1861, to the contrary notwithstanding; and that I will uphold and defend the government of Virginia as vindicated and restored by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 11th day of June, 1861."

5. If any elective officer, who is required by the preceding section to take such oath or affirmation, fail or refuse so to do, it shall be the duty of the Governor, upon satisfactory evidence of the fact, to issue his writ declaring the office to be vacant, and providing for a special election to fill such vacancy, at some convenient and early day to be designated in said writ, of which due publication shall be made for the information of the persons entitled to vote at such election, and such writ may be directed, at the discretion of the Governor, to the sheriff or sheriffs of the proper county or counties, or to a special commissioner or commissioners, to be named by the Governor, for the purpose. If the officer who fails or refuses to take such oath or affirmation be appointed by the Governor, he shall fill the vacancy without writ; but if such officer be appointed otherwise than by the Governor or by election, the writ shall be issued by the Governor, directed to the appointing power, requiring it to fill the vacancy.

ARTHUR I. BOREMAN, President.

G. L. CRANMER, Secretary.

It will be observed that the convention exercised no power save what was imperiously demanded by the exigencies of the times. They formed no new government, but retained the old. They provided for the assembling of the Legislature at Wheeling on the 1st day of July, 1861. The members of both General Assembly and Senate comprising that Legislature, with the exception of a few vacancies, had been elected duly and regularly before the State seceded.

In the prosecution of their undertaking to wrest the State from conspirators and traitors, the battle-bugle of the convention blew no uncertain sound. They did not ask to have the line between treason and loyalty clearly, distinctly, and definitely laid down in order that they might see how near they could dress up to the former without running the risk of hemp. They were at heart for the Union, and made no nice distinctions against it. "Thorough" was their motto. The following ordinances show this:

An Ordinance to authorize the apprehending of suspicious persons in time of war, passed June 19, 1861.

The people of Virginia, by their delegates assembled in convention at Wheeling, do ordain that the sixth and seventh sections of the seventeenth chapter of the Code of Virginia be amended and reenacted to read as follows:

1. The Governor may cause to be apprehended and secured, or may compel to depart from the State, all suspicious subjects or citizens of any foreign State or Power at war with the United States.

2. And whereas the convention of Richmond have declared the union between the State of Virginia and the other States, under the Constitution of the United States, to be dissolved, and have attempted to transfer the allegiance of the people of this State to an illegal confederacy of rebellious States, called the confederate States of America; claiming that the State of Virginia and the said confederate States are rightfully, and in fact, foreign States or Powers in reference to the United States: now, therefore, all persons in this Commonwealth adhering to and supporting the said convention at Richmond, or the said confederate States, or professing to owe allegiance or obedience to the same, shall be deemed (for the purposes of this ordinance only) subjects or citizens of a foreign State or Power at war with the United States.

3. The Governor may send for the person and papers of any such person within this State in order to obtain information to enable him to act in such cases.

4. Any warrant or order of the Governor under this ordinance may be directed to any sheriff or other officer, civil or military, and shall be executed according to the terms thereof by such officer, who shall have all the powers necessary for the purpose, either in or out of his county or corporation.

5. If the Governor shall have just cause to believe that any persons in this State, claiming to be subjects or citizens of the said confederate States, or adhering to and supporting the said convention or the said confederate States, or professing to owe allegiance or obedience to the same, are about to assemble together, or have assembled together, for the purpose of drilling or receiving military instruction, or to organize themselves as a military force, or to attempt any military operation, or do any act which may endanger the safety or welfare of the good people of this Commonwealth, or any portion of the same, he may cause such assembly to be prevented or dispersed, and the persons who may be about to assemble, or have assembled as aforesaid, to be apprehended and secured, or may compel them to depart from this State; and for this purpose he may issue his warrant or order, directed to any sheriff or other officer, civil or military, which warrant or order shall be executed as aforesaid. And any assemblage of two or more persons for any purpose inimical to the Government of the United States, or of this State as reorganized by this convention, shall be deemed an unlawful assembly, and the persons so offending may be proceeded against and punished as provided in chapter one hundred and ninety-five of the Code of Virginia.

6. If any sheriff or other person shall transmit or pay any money, or any check, draft, bill, order, note, or certificate, for the payment of money, to any officer or other person at Richmond or elsewhere, for the use of the said confederate States, or of the illegal State government at Richmond, now waging war against the United States, or shall furnish any money, arms, military equipments, or munitions of war, or aid, or other support to the said confederate States, or State government, or to any military force under the control or direction of the same, or to any person or persons about to join any such military force, the Governor may cause to be apprehended and secured, or may cause to depart from this State, the sheriff or other person guilty of such offense, and for this purpose may issue his warrant or order and cause the same to be executed as hereinbefore provided.

7. The powers vested in the Governor by this ordinance shall be exercised only upon satisfactory evidence and with the concurrence of a majority of his council.

8. This ordinance shall take effect from its passage, and may be altered or repealed by the General Assembly.

ARTHUR I. BOREMAN, President.

G. L. CRANMER, Secretary.

An Ordinance declaring null and void the proceedings of the Richmond convention of 1861, passed August, 1861.

The people of Virginia, by their delegates assembled in convention at Wheeling, do ordain as follows:

1. All ordinances, acts, orders, resolutions, and other proceedings of the convention which assembled at Richmond on the 13th day of February last, being without the authority of the people of Virginia constitutionally given, and in derogation of their rights, are hereby declared illegal, inoperative, null, void, and without force or effect.

A. I. BOREMAN, President.

G. L. CRANMER, Secretary.

Thus Virginia was kept on the constitutional track. In those mountainous regions, the Thermopylae passes where freedom's most holy altars have ever been raised, and where her fires have burned brightest, treason found no resting-place. The motto on the great seal of West Virginia was as true as to her in those dark days of 1861 as it is true historically—"Montani semper liberi."

What was the theory on which this action of the Wheeling convention of June, 1861, was based? Why, that traitors, even if in a majority, could not take the State out of the Union; that the majority in a State can only make their political action effective under the Constitution, and that such action, if outside of and in derogation of the Constitution, is of no legal or binding effect, but is null and void.

What course was the Union minority to take? They had to submit to the confederacy, remain in a state of confusion and anarchy, with all civil and municipal laws suspended, with martial or military law administered by shoulder-strapped gentlemen—some of whom "magnify their office" in a way that would have put the great apostle to the Gentiles to the blush—or take the course they did. Who can doubt they did right? Who will say their course was abnormal, unconstitutional?

Can territory acquired by purchase from foreign nations, or won from them at the sword's point, be erected into new States, and four hundred thousand of the loyal citizens of one of the "Old Thirteen" be denationalized because six hundred thousand citizens of the same State see fit to make traitors of themselves?

The restored State, as I have said already, at the outset was composed of thirty-four counties and nearly a fourth part of the white population of the State. County after county was added until more than sixty out of the one hundred and forty-eight counties of which the State was composed were rallied under the stars and stripes, and more than a third part of the white population. The loyal counties embraced more than a third part of the area of the whole State.

Mr. Speaker, test it as you may, I believe in the legality of the action of that convention. Instead of their doings being Red Republican and disorganizing, I believe them to have been conservative and reactionary. Instead of shaking the foundations of the temple of civil rights and constitutional law from donjon-keep to turret wall, I believe it was sinking those foundations deeper, making them broader and more massive, adding buttress and coigne of vantage.

If expediency is to be taken into consideration when passing upon a great question like this, all doubt is removed. If disloyalty had existed in the northwestern as in the other portions of the State, the consequences would have been sad indeed.

My friend from West Virginia [Mr. BLAIR] asks me, "What would have been the effect upon Ohio and Pennsylvania under such a state of things?" In order to understand how disastrous the effect would have been, let us see what hostile force would have been at their doors. How many members on this floor know the number of troops furnished by this State of Virginia, that had been "plucked as a brand from the burning," to the cause of the Union? Why, sir, only twenty-five thousand—only an army twice as large as that with which General Scott marched from Vera Cruz to Mexico! A result of some importance, it strikes me, Mr. Speaker, to have kept that body of men out of the secession ranks! I will refer my friend to the members from the two great States to which he called my attention. They can answer the question much more fully than is in my power.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. If my friend will allow me just a word I desire to make a statement in connection with the remark he is now making: So far as the new State of West Virginia is concerned, she has not only filled every call made by the President of the United States for troops to put down this rebellion, but she has now a surplus of about sixteen hundred men ready to respond to any future call the President may make.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir; but lest a wrong impression should obtain, the gentleman will permit me to say that the State of Virginia furnished the twenty-five thousand troops of which I speak before she was divided, not the new State of West Virginia. The Legislature which assembled at Wheeling in 1861-62 was not the Legislature of West Virginia. West Virginia was not a State until near the close of last year, I think in December. I speak of Virginia, of the "Old Dominion."

But suppose there were doubts as to the political status of Virginia. What right has this House to deny that she is one of the States of this Union, in full fellowship and standing? Are you not estopped from any such denial? Both branches of the legislative department have committed themselves on this question. In 1861 the Senate admitted CARLILE and WILLEY as Senators, and the House BLAIR, BROWN, and WHALEY as Representatives, from the State of Virginia. The first few weeks of this session the State was fully represented in the Senate, and would have continued thus represented but for the untimely end of the gallant and lamented Bowden. You also acknowledged the State in 1863 by the admission of my colleague, (Mr. Segar.) The members here this day from West Virginia are only here upon this hypothesis. The Treasury Department has acknowledged it by the payment of $40,000 surplus revenue which for years had been standing on the books to the credit of Virginia. War, Navy, Interior, and Post Office Departments have over and over made such recognition.

The executive department, the President, has done the same. In the proclamation accompanying his message of December last he does not name Virginia as among the rebellious States which might come back under his ten per cent. rule. Speaking as he does in that proclamation of his desire not to interfere with any government that had already been organized shows conclusively, if other evidence were wanting, his opinion as to this question.

Respect for and obedience to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have undergone many mutations in this good land of ours since my day, to say nothing of its earlier history. Let us see whether the law as laid down by that tribunal, in decisions given by a Marshall and a Taney, fortifies my position. And, Mr. Speaker, I hope, inasmuch as what old Fuller quaintly calls the images of God cut in ebony were not concerned or interested in the cases to which I shall refer, that the law laid down in them may be considered as entitled to some weight.

The first case to which I will call the attention of the House is that of United States vs. Palmer, 3 Wheaton, 610. It came up from the United States circuit court for Massachusetts on a division of opinion between the circuit and district judge.

One of the questions taken up to the Supreme Court was this:

"6. Whether an act which would be deemed a robbery on the high seas, if done without a lawful commission, is protected from being considered as a robbery on the high seas when the same act is done under a commission or the color of a commission from any foreign colony, district, or people, which have revolted from their native allegiance, and have declared themselves independent and sovereign, and have assumed to exercise the powers and authorities of an independent and sovereign government, but have never been acknowledged or recognized as an independent or sovereign government or nation by the United States, or by any other foreign State, prince, or sovereignty?"

Chief Justice Marshall says:

"Those questions which respect the rights of a part of a foreign empire which asserts and is contending for its independence, and the conduct which must be observed by the courts of the Union toward the subjects of such section of an empire who may be brought before the tribunals of this country, are equally delicate and difficult.

"As it is understood that the construction which has been given to the act of Congress will render a particular answer to them unnecessary, the court will only observe that such questions are generally rather political than legal in their character. They belong more properly to those who can declare what the law shall be; who can place the nation in such a position with respect to foreign Powers as to their own judgment shall appear wise; to whom are intrusted all its foreign relations; than to that tribunal whose power as well as duty is confined to the application of the rule which the Legislature may prescribe for it. In such contests a nation may engage itself with the one party or the other; may observe absolute neutrality; may recognize the new State absolutely, or may make a limited recognition of it. The proceedings in courts must depend so entirely on the course of the Government that it is difficult to give a precise answer to questions which do not refer to a particular nation. It may be said generally, that if the Government remains neutral and recognizes the existence of a civil war, its courts cannot consider as criminal those acts of hostility which war authorizes, and which the new government may direct against its enemy. To decide otherwise would be to determine that the war prosecuted by one of the parties was unlawful, and would be to arraign the nation to which the court belongs against that party. This would transcend the limits prescribed to the judicial department."

The second case, or rather cases, to which I wish to call attention are those of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, 42.

Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, lays down in substance the same principle as to intestine difficulties in one of the States of this Union that Chief Justice Marshall had laid down as to like difficulties occurring in a foreign nation in the case of Palmer.

If the State represented at Wheeling, in 1861, 1862, and 1863, was Virginia, then the State represented now at Alexandria is the State of Virginia. Last year the State was divided, and West Virginia set off. Legally speaking, if there was enough of the old territory remaining to set a flag-staff on, that part thus remaining would be the State of Virginia. In point of fact, the area thus left is larger than Delaware—twice as large as Rhode Island.

Maine, in 1821, was set off from Massachusetts. Suppose the territory which formed the new State had embraced all of Massachusetts save Boston, does any one deny that Boston would have constituted the State of Massachusetts; would have been entitled to two United States Senators, and just so many Representatives as her population, under the apportionment, would have given her?

What, then, becomes of the proposition of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, that, if we are admitted to our seats, a precedent will be established which will govern every district in every rebellious State? What confederate State presents a case like this of Virginia? Is there one?

I had intended to show that the principle involved in the territorial bill of the gentleman from Maryland, which has lately passed this House, would not be affected in its operation as to other States by our admission, but both my voice and the clock warn me to be brief.

Neither would our admission be inconsistent with the decision of this House in the case of Kitchen. He was ruled out on account of the wandering character of the county of Berkeley, in which he received nearly all his votes. It was not exactly certain whether it was in Virginia or West Virginia.

Whatever may be the result of the voting in our cases, I shall be satisfied it will be arrived at as the dictate of calm deliberation and mature judgment.

As this, Mr. Speaker, is the first time I have ever been before any legislative body, even as a claimant for a seat, it is possible, nay, more than probable, that I may have shown some lack of courtesy, may have violated some parliamentary rule. If I have been so unfortunate, I can only say it has not been intentional, and I have been punished in a most effectual way by the more than kindness with which the members of the House have treated me.

Let me also say that I deem it an honor to have been permitted to stand here this day, to have had the privilege of addressing the Representatives of this mighty nation in the building which has been honored by the eloquent presence and utterances of the great men whose names stand so high on the rolls "in that temple where the dead are honored by the nations."

Here I have had the good fortune to hear him who now sleeps at Marshfield, with the mighty ocean sounding his requiem; the great Commoner, who never veiled his crest to mortal foe, and who now rests well in that State which has again been made a "dark and bloody ground," by those whom as her children she had cherished in her bosom; and that later statesman, who, however men may differ as to his early career, had his life sunlit at its close by the truest patriotism, and who fell like the tree broken by the weight of its own golden fruitage.

In their names, in the name of any and every man who has spoken for our nationality, for the great cause of human progress and the true interests of humanity, I would pray you to rise to the height of this occasion. I do not, I cannot, I will not believe that there is any real difference between parties here as to the consummation desired. "Pulse beats to pulse, and heart to heart responsive."

Sooner or later, this rebellion will be crushed. "The mills of God if they grind slowly grind surely."

Whether the dawn is now ready to sprinkle with rosy light hilltop and valley, or whether the watches of a moonless and a starless night are still to be endured, the dawn will come, ushering in a day glorious in its final consequences as that on which the "morning stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy."

I see it not alone in the thousands whose sounding tread is heard in our streets, and who are pressing to the front. The whole atmosphere is full of encouragement, laden with promise. I see it in the more than Howard efforts of our Sanitary Commission in the dispensation in charities of sums vaster than the dowers of queens. I see it in the sacrifices made at every hearthstone in the land, in the calm agony of the father, the tearful smiles of the mother. It would need no Peter the Hermit to create an enthusiasm in this loyal land to which any that has as yet stirred the popular heart would be but as the ripples of an inland lake to the hissing, seething, broad-backed waves of the Atlantic, lashed into fury by the storm-winds of the equinox.

Yes, sir, the Union will be restored. Like the mangled limbs of Osiris, bone will be knit to bone, joint to joint, sinew to sinew, and rounded and swelling in its fair proportions it will stand forth a glorious embodiment of beauty and strength. It will move with a freer and a firmer tread on the great pathway of nations, and woe to him, be he king or kaiser, who dares impede its course, for "The Douglas and the Hotspur both together

Are confident against the world in arms."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, requesting the return to the Senate of the bill of the Senate (No. 176) authorizing the erection of buildings for a branch mint at San Francisco, for the purpose of correcting an error in the engrossment.

No objection being made, the Clerk was directed to return the said bill.

VIRGINIA ELECTIONS—AGAIN.

Mr. DAWES. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER stated that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was entitled to the floor to close debate.

Mr. DAWES. Recognizing the signal ability and fairness as well as earnestness and eloquence with which gentlemen have presented their claims here to-day to represent the districts from which they come, I nevertheless do not feel that there is any necessity or justification for my occupying any considerable portion of the time of the House upon the subject. Indeed, most of the positions taken by the gentlemen are those which have already, in a much feebler form, been taken by myself in behalf of the committee.

The committee have felt in every step of their investigation of and report upon these cases, that any rule laid down by them would be surrounded by difficulties, and that its application in many cases would seem to be extremely hard, and of such a character as to almost justify its being laid aside. And I feel I but speak the sentiment of the whole House to-day when I say that if we should consult our feelings only, the vote of this House would be thrown for the gentlemen who have pleaded the case of Virginia to-day, and that with open arms they would welcome them as fitting representatives of that Union spirit which has sacrificed so much and endured so much and so long in these troublesome times.

But, sir, it is quite apparent that as a House of Representatives, governed by some rules, we should not take counsel of our feelings and our partialities and our admiration in settling the question as to who shall be the Representative of a particular district upon this floor, but that we should be guided by some rule which shall seem to us as a whole to be fraught with some wisdom and with a better result to the Republic in these anomalous times, than any other. Now, sir, it is not that the rule adopted by the committee is perfect, that there cannot be under it supposable cases in which it will work hardship, that it has been adopted by them, but it is because they have seen no other which would in the long run secure that great end of all representation here, the free voice of the people of each district, that they have sought as well as they may, in the examination of each of these cases and all other cases, to ascertain whether any gentleman may come here representing the Union sentiment of his district.

When the gentleman admits that he cannot claim that a minority, however small, is entitled to a representation upon this floor, because one or ten men may send a man here whose voice and whose influence and whose vote here shall be equal to that of the Representative of the constitutional number of one hundred and twenty thousand, as the ratio under the Constitution for the rest of us, he fritters the whole case away; for unless a minority, however small, can send a man here, then no minority can do it, because between a minority of one comparative size and another minority there is no dividing line; and you could not tell whether it were a minority of one or ten or a hundred or a thousand.

The rule adopted by the committee, the committee themselves say, is not entirely a satisfactory one, but it is the best rule that suggests itself upon the testimony presented by each man claiming to be a Representative. We have sought from him and from the circumstances surrounding the evidence of each case, whether or not the cases are clothed with that authority which we alone can recognize, namely, a majority of the majority of voters.

My friend has argued with great ability here that there is no question of territorial or State suicide involved in this case. He had the candor to do the committee justice by saying that they put his case upon no such ground as that. The committee, without stopping to examine the soundness of any such doctrine, have settled as well as they could these cases clear of all such embarrassing questions. They liken this case unto the case of other Representatives from Virginia, and so far as the Committee of Elections is concerned, and so far as the principles they have found necessary to lay down are concerned, they look to one source, and one only, for the solution of this question, and that is, to the Army. When the Army shall have been to the district which my friend desires to represent, and to the other districts in these rebellious States; and shall have driven rebellion and treason and armed occupation by the enemies of the country from their midst, then the doors of this Capitol will open to those two gentlemen and they will come in here, and Virginia will come here clothed and in her right mind. And, sir, with their Representatives, to whom we have listened with so much pleasure, we shall see again the star in its natural orb, making its diurnal and annual revolutions with all its sister stars, and in that eternity of revolution to which we hope this Republic with all its stars is destined. Sir, that time will come, and come only, as it follows the arms of the nation; and while I may agree with my friend in reference to the territorial question, State suicide, &c., or may not agree with him, I think there is no gentleman in the House, whatever may be his opinion, who can with reason look to any deliverance or any other solution of this question. And, sir, wishing that day to come, hoping its dawn is already upon us, we say to these gentlemen, in no unkindness, that while our hearts sympathize with those who have borne the heat and burden of this rebellion, who have borne testimony by their acts and by their sacrifices to their loyalty, when that day comes they shall find a welcome upon this floor.

I say this much that these gentlemen may not go out of this House with a feeling that either the committee or the House desires to close its doors against representation, for I do not believe that to be the feeling or sentiment of any gentleman upon the floor of this House. And if the House shall vote to-day that they are not entitled to their seats, it will be because neither by the rule they have adopted nor by any other rule can they say that these gentlemen have received the votes of a majority of the Union voters in any district in the State of Virginia.

The question being upon the adoption of the following resolution—

Resolved, That Joseph Segar is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, from the first district in Virginia—

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, John D. Baldwin, Benman, Bontwell, James S. Brown, Clauser, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denning, Donnelly, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hohman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Jenekes, William Johnson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Law, Loan, Long, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, McDouge, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Morrison, Amos Myers, Noble, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Perlman, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Eldridge, Glider, Hall, Harding, Mallory, Marcy, Moorhead, Nelson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Stuart, Tracy, Ward, Webster, Whaley, and Wheeler—23.

So the resolution was adopted.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Lucius H. Chandler is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the second congressional district of Virginia.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the votes by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. In this connection I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Joseph Segar, Lucius H. Chandler, and B. M. Kitchen, claimants of seats in this House as Representatives from Virginia, each the usual mileage of a member for one session and the monthly pay from the commencement of the session till the passage of the resolution in each case declaring them not entitled to a seat.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It is, if it be a report from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. I ought not to say that it is the report of the committee. I simply offered the resolution on my own motion.

The SPEAKER. The resolution having been offered in connection with the report of the committee just disposed of, is, in accordance with the custom of the House, properly before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it has been decided otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The resolution would certainly not be privileged if delayed until after the subject had passed away from the House, but the Chair thinks that, offered in connection with the subject, it has been usually regarded as privileged.

Mr. DAWES. If the resolution is before the House, I desire to call the previous question on it.

Mr. ALLEY. I rise to a question of order. I make the point that Mr. Chandler is an officer of the Government, and that he cannot receive pay for services rendered to the Government in another capacity.

The SPEAKER. Even if the Chair were in possession of that fact, which he is not, except as just stated by the gentleman, it is not a question of order for him to decide; but for the accounting officer under the law.

Mr. DAWES. If the fact be as my colleague states it, I will modify my resolution. I know that the statute provides that no man can receive two salaries or be paid twice.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The accounting officer can settle the question.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. At the time Mr. Chandler was elected to Congress he did not hold an office under the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that this is a report from the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated at the time, from his recollection of precedents, that he ruled it in order, whether it came from the Committee of Elections or from a member, as incident to the cases just decided. The Chair will state further, whether the decision was right or wrong, it is now too late to take an appeal, as the House is acting on it.

Mr. DAWES. I will withdraw my resolution with a view to understanding the fact, and offer it in the morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman certainly cannot offer it as a privileged question after the present time; it then becomes merely a claim.

Mr. DAWES. Then I am willing that the resolution shall be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. NOBLE. I hope that the matter will be referred to the Committee of Elections, so that the House will have a report of the facts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the resolution be postponed until to-morrow morning.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. We will be in the same condition to-morrow that we are in now in reference to the facts.

Mr. ALLEY. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move, as a modification of my motion, that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Elections, with leave to report at any time.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to amend the postal laws; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommittees to the same committee.

BANK BILL.

Mr. GANSON, by unanimous consent, moved that the Senate amendments to the bank bill be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported back House bill No. 474, relative to the public printing.

The bill provides that that part of the act entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864," which provides "that hereafter no printing or binding shall be done or blank-books be procured for any of the Executive Departments of the Government without a requisition on the Superintendent of Public Printing from the head of such Department," be amended by inserting after the word "Department," where it is last above written, the following words, "or his assistant or assistants;" so that it will read, "the head of such Department or his assistant or assistants."

Mr. A. W. CLARK demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. LAW, (at twenty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 18, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, information relative to the steps taken toward the erection of a naval hospital at Kittery, Maine; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented two memorials from citizens of New York, remonstrating against any change of the act regulating the manner of taxing express companies; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of manufacturers of the United States praying for the enactment of suitable laws for the encouragement of foreign immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of men and women of the United States, praying for the abolition of slavery, and the adoption of measures for so amending the Constitution as forever to prohibit its existence in any portion of the country; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. HARRIS presented a memorial of citizens of Chautauqua county, New York, and a memorial of citizens of Erie county, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

DUTIES ON IMPORTED GOODS.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to present a memorial, one of which I think is already on the files of the Senate, from the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, complaining of the construction put upon the joint resolution approved April 29, 1864, increasing the duties fifty per cent. upon the then amount of duties; and I take occasion to say that upon examination of the question, which I did as soon as I received the memorial, I am satisfied that the memorialists are substantially correct. The Secretary of the Treasury has, I think, fallen into an error. The uniform decisions of the courts upon the question have been that importations under our acts of Congress are complete when the vessel arrives at her port of entry intending there to discharge her cargo. The Secretary of the Treasury seems to be of opinion that the importation is not completed until the duties are paid. The Supreme Court have decided in a variety of cases, following in that particular the decisions of the district courts, that the importation is complete upon the arrival of the vessel in the port. As far back as a case reported in 1 Gallison, the United States vs. Lindsey, the court held, (I quote their words:—

"By the arrival of the vessel at the port of Bristol, on the 30th of June, with an intent there to unload her cargo, the importation was complete. The duties accrue on the importation, and not on the entry at the custom-house."

The effect of that decision was that she was not liable to the duties imposed by the act of July 1, 1812. The Senate will recollect that by that act the duties which were before imposed were doubled, and this vessel having arrived at the port of Bristol on the 30th of June, the act having passed on the 1st of July, and not having paid any duty, if the importation was not considered as completed at the time of her arrival on the 30th of June, the cargo was subject to the double duty, but the court decided without any hesitation that the importation was a complete importation on the day when the vessel arrived at her port of entry intending to discharge. The converse of that proposition has been maintained by two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases of Sampson vs. Peasey, and Irvine vs. Redfield, reported respectively in 20 and 23 Howard, in which it was ruled that the period of exportation from a foreign country to the United States under the acts of July 30, 1846, and March 3, 1851, was the day of the sailing of the vessel, and not the clearing day at the custom-house. If the period of exportation is the sailing of the vessel, it would seem necessarily to follow that the importation is finished when she arrives at her port of entry.

In the particular mentioned, therefore, I think the Secretary has fallen into a mistake. I am informed that he is exacting the increase of duties from vessels that were in ports of entry intending to discharge cargo there before the joint resolution was passed at all. But he has fallen, I think, into another error in relation to vessels that arrive at their ports of entry before, as I think, the resolution became operative. Under the Constitution of the United States the resolution could have no effect until after it was approved by the President. It seems that a variety of vessels arrived at their ports of entry the evening preceding and the morning of the day when the President approved of the resolution, but before the actual approval. The Secretary's error is in applying the legal doctrine that there is no fraction of a day to a law of this description. The doctrine itself is but a legal fiction, and has never been enforced, if by enforcing it any actual injustice will be the result; and the courts have decided uniformly, both with reference to crimes and torts and duties, that the exact time of the day when the law becomes operative may be ascertained.

Upon both these grounds, therefore, in my opinion—and it is due to the memorialists perhaps that I should say so—I think the Secretary is in error, and that their application ought to be granted.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a memorial of S. W. Godon, commodore, United States Navy, praying relief from the alleged injustice done him in consequence of being placed on the retired list under the act of Congress to further promote the efficiency of the Navy, approved December 21, 1861, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to, a general bill having already been reported on the subject.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 32) to regulate the sessions of the circuit and district courts for the northern district of New York, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. COWAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 356) requiring proof of payment of duties on foreign salt before payment of the allowances provided for by the acts of July 29, 1813, and March 3, 1819, have instructed me to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, who have under consideration the subject of fishing bounties, which covers the design contemplated by this bill.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 268) for increased facilities of telegraph communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States and the Territory of Idaho, have instructed me to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, who have that subject under consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a memorial from the Governor of Utah Territory, representing that the fund for the contingent expenses of that Territory is entirely inadequate, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

STAFF OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) relative to pay of staff officers of the Lieutenant General, to report it back without amendment; and if there be no objection I should like to put it on its passage now. It is a very small matter.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that the staff officers on the staff of the Lieutenant General shall be entitled to receive the same pay, emoluments, and allowances as staff officers of the same grade on the staff of corps commanders, to take effect from the day of their appointment on the staff of the Lieutenant General.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HOWE was, on his motion, excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARDING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 279) to amend the act of Congress making donations to settlers on the public lands in Oregon, approved September 27, 1850, and the acts amendatory thereto; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 280) to amend an act entitled "An act to facilitate communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electric telegraph," approved June 16, 1860; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 55) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

BRANCH MINT AT SAN FRANCISCO.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, it was Ordered, That the Secretary cause the error in the engrossment of the bill (S. No. 176) authorizing the erection of buildings for the branch mint at San Francisco to be corrected by inserting in the third line of the engrossed bill, between the words "three" and "thousand," the word "hundred," and that he return the bill so corrected to the House of Representatives.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, which were heretofore signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (S. No. 139) for the relief of Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, of Co-shooton county, Ohio;

A bill (S. No. 197) for the relief of Charles L. Nelson;

A joint resolution (S. No. 21) to provide for the printing of official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 37) for the payment of expenses incurred by the joint committee on the conduct of the war.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 16th instant the following acts:

An act (S. No. 38) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of A. Bush, late public printer for the Territory of Oregon; and

An act (S. No. 76) relating to appointments in the naval service, and courts-martial.

RAILROADS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. HARLAN. There are two or three bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands of considerable importance, and I desire the Senate to permit them to be taken up and acted on now. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 250.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 250) to amend the act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1856, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands had reported the bill with an amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows, namely: substitute for the words "and from Grand Rapids to some point on or near Traverse bay," contained in the first section of said act, these words: "and from a point on the southern boundary line of the State of Michigan, in the township of Sturgis, by way of Grand Rapids, to some point on or near Traverse bay." And the said act shall be, and is hereby, so amended as to substitute for the first clause of the first proviso in the first section thereof, so far as the same shall be applicable to the grant of lands made to aid in the construction of the railroad described by the foregoing amendment, these words: "Provided, That the lands to be so selected shall in no case be further than twenty miles from the line of said road."

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the lands granted by the act amended by this act, and also by the provisions of this act, to aid in the construction of the railroad described in the foregoing section, shall be disposed of only in the following manner, that is to say, when the Governor of the State of Michigan shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that ten consecutive miles of said road has been completed in a good and substantial manner as a first-class railroad, indicating definitely where said completed section commences and where the same terminates, the said Secretary shall cause patents to issue to said State for so much of said lands as are located opposite to and continuous with said completed section of said road, and so from time to time for each completed section of ten miles of said road until the whole shall be completed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the amendment of the committee in section one, line nine, by striking out the words "from a point on the southern boundary line of the State of Michigan," and inserting the words "from the city of Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana."

Mr. HARLAN. I do not know what the sense of the Senate will be in relation to this amendment, but if it should be approved I think the phraseology might be amended so as to say, "from Fort Wayne, through the township of Sturgis, on the southern boundary of Michigan." That will leave the line in the State of Michigan, as it now stands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I accept that modification. The purpose is to enable this company to complete its entire work. Its work is intended to run from Fort Wayne up into the State of Michigan. Of course no part of the lands will be used in the construction of that part of the road which is in the State of Indiana unless there be an excess, under the phraseology of this bill; but as it is one entire work, and as this would secure capital from the State of Indiana, I think it would be a benefit to the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator from Indiana again reported. I did not understand it before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again reported.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana is in line nine, section one of the amendment of the committee, to strike out the words "from a point on the southern boundary line of the State of Michigan," and insert "from Fort Wayne, through the township of Sturgis."

Mr. HARLAN. I propose to have the bill read in this way, which I think will be acceptable to the Senator from Indiana:

And from Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana, to a point on the southern boundary line of the State of Michigan in the township of Sturgis, thence by way of Grand Rapids to a point at or near Traverse bay.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the amendment I desire to accept.

Mr. HOWARD. I will inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether this appropriation of lands lying in Michigan would not apply to that portion of the railroad route which lies within Indiana; in other words, whether it is not a transfer of the fund arising from the sale of lands in Michigan to the construction of a railroad or a part of a railroad in Indiana. I understand that it is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will answer the Senator with pleasure. The effect of it will be just this: if there should be an excess of the land fund for the construction of a road in Michigan the company may use it to construct that part of the road from Fort Wayne to the Michigan State line; but according to the framework of this bill the funds arising from the sale of the land must be used to construct the line opposite to the land that is thus sold. I believe that is the provision of the bill, and of all the bills that have been reported at this session. The lands cannot be used except in constructing that portion of the road running through the lands unless there be an excess. This is one entire enterprise, and I think the company desires this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as modified, will be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment as modified, which was, in line nine of the first section of the amendment of the committee, after the word "from" to insert "Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana," and in line eleven, after the word "Sturgis," to insert "thence;" so as to read:

And from Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana, to a point on the southern boundary line of the State of Michigan, in the township of Sturgis, thence by way of Grand Rapids to some point on or near Traverse Bay.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read: A bill to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 474) to amend an act relative to the public printing; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 251) to organize a regiment of veteran volunteer engineers.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 381) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 15, 1856.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Chair calls up the order of the day, being Senate bill No. 265, the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HARLAN. I hope the Senator in charge of that bill will consent to let it go over informally until this bill is disposed of.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to its going over informally. I suppose this bill will give rise to no debate, as it only proposes to give away a few million acres of the public lands.

Mr. HARLAN. There will be no debate upon it whatever, I think.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It will take less time to dispose of the bill now than to postpone it and take it up again at some other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the special order will be passed over informally. The amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands to the bill will be read.

The first amendment of the committee was in section one, line nineteen, to strike out the words "may be found practicable by said company," and to insert in lieu thereof:

The line surveyed and located by Mr. Day in the year 1854 or 1856, and not further north of said town than the north line of section twenty-two, township eighty north, of range nineteen, according to the United States surveys.

So that the proviso will read:

Provided, That said line shall pass through the town of Newton, in Jasper county, or as near said town as the line surveyed and located by Mr. Day, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line seven, to insert the word "public" before the word "lands;" and in line eight to strike out the words "and subject to entry," and to insert in lieu thereof:

Not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, or to which a preemption claim or right of homestead settlement has not attached, and on which a bona fide settlement and improvement has not been made under color of title derived from the United States or from the State of Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line nine, before the word "lands" to insert the word "public;" and in line ten to strike out the words "and subject to entry," and to insert in lieu thereof:

Not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, or to which a preemption claim or right of homestead settlement has not attached, and on which a bona fide settlement and improvement has not been made under color of title derived from the United States or from the State of Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line twenty-two, to strike out the words "and the land grant act of the Legislature of Iowa, giving said grant to said company."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line thirty-four, before the word "lands," to insert the word "public," and in line thirty-five, after the word "States," to insert:

Not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, or to which a preemption right or right of homestead settlement has not attached, and on which a bona fide settlement and improvement has not been made under color of title derived from the United States or from the State of Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line forty-eight, to strike out the words "from any land in the United States not otherwise appropriated."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line sixty-three, after the word "lands" to insert "as hereinbefore described."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section four, line seventy, to strike out the words "when the said company shall complete and furnish the Secretary of the Interior with satisfactory evidence that it," and to insert "when the Governor of the State of Iowa shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that said company."

So that the clause will read:

When the Governor of the State of Iowa shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that said company has completed in good running order a section of twenty consecutive miles of the main line of said road west of Nevada, then the Secretary shall convey to said company one third, and no more, of the lands granted for said connecting branch.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line eighty-seven, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no lands shall be conveyed to said company on account of said connecting branch road until the Governor of the State of Iowa shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that the same shall have been completed as a first-class railroad. And no land shall be conveyed to said company situate and lying within fifteen miles of the line of the Mississippi and Missouri railroad:

Provided further, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, and he is hereby required, to reserve a quantity of land embraced in the grant described in this section, sufficient, in the opinion of the Governor of Iowa, to secure the construction of a branch railroad from the town of Lyons, in the State of Iowa, so as to connect with the main line in or west of the town of Clinton, in said State, until the Governor of said State shall certify that said branch railroad is completed according to the requirements of the laws of said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line one hundred and thirteen, to strike out the word "as" and insert "rights."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of section four the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no lands shall be conveyed to any company or party whatsoever, under the provisions of this act and the act amended by this act, which has been settled upon and improved in good faith by a bona fide inhabitant, under color of title derived from the United States or from the State of Iowa adverse to the grant made by this act or the act to which this act is an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section five, line three, after the word "made" to insert the words "to said company."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section five the following proviso:

Provided, That said transfer and assignment shall first be authorized by the Legislature of the State of Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven, line three, to strike out the word "hereinbefore," and after the word "changed" to insert "by this act," and in line six to insert "and may hereafter be modified;" so that it will read:

That all of the conditions and limitations contained in the act to which this act is an amendment, and not expressly changed by this act, shall attach to and run with the grants made by this act, except as the said conditions and limitations have been modified, and may hereafter be modified, by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line two, to strike out the words "unless it shall complete" and to insert "until the Governor of the State of Iowa shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that the said company has completed;" in line seven, after the word "terminus" to insert "of the completed portion of said railroad;" and in line eleven, after the word "proof" to insert "as aforesaid;" so that it will read:

That no lands hereby granted shall be certified to either of said companies until the Governor of the State of Iowa shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that the said company has completed, ready for the rolling stock, within one year from the 1st day of July next, a section of not less than twenty miles from the present terminus of the completed portion of said railroad, and in each year thereafter an additional section of twenty miles; but the number of sections per mile originally authorized shall be certified to each company upon proof, as aforesaid, of the completion of the additional sections of the road as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended. Mr. MORRILL. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee who reports this bill for some explanation of it. As I followed the reading of it, I am not sure that I understand it exactly. I should like to have the chairman of the committee state the general scope of the bill, if he will.

Mr. HARLAN. If it becomes a law it will enable the companies in Iowa to consolidate their lines, to build one line through instead of various lines to the western portion of the State. It will enable all the roads that have heretofore had land grants in Iowa to change the location of the line of their roads west of the present completed portion of their roads. Under the law as it now stands they can make their locations within fifteen miles. This enlarges the limit so that they can make the locations within twenty miles.

Mr. MORRILL. Does it give an additional quantity of lands? If so, I should like to inquire to what extent.

Mr. HARLAN. It proposes to give an additional quantity of lands, if the lands can be found, to build a branch road from one of these lines to the other, so as to facilitate the consolidation of the work west of the completed portion of the lines, and also for a few miles on the Missouri river, to make a connection with the Pacific railroad at an important point on the Missouri river. The distance is perhaps fifteen or twenty miles.

Mr. MORRILL. What is the estimated grant of lands under this bill?

Mr. HARLAN. We have made no estimate of the amount of lands in addition to those they would receive under the law as it now stands, because the lands have all been culled over and been in market for a long time. It is said that on one of these lines they will receive about sixteen hundred acres more than they would have received under the law as it stood before. On the other lines I think they will receive more, and I think they will receive more than that on that line; but the lands are all the refuse lands that have been culled over and have been left.

Mr. GRIMES. I will state to the Senator from Maine that there are but six hundred and six thousand acres of public land unsold in the whole State of Iowa—enough for a good-sized farm.

Mr. HARLAN. I ought to observe, I think, that this bill will not increase the number of acres that the roads will receive beyond that granted by the law as it now stands, except on these two short lines of branch roads.

Mr. MORRILL. That was my inquiry. On page 4, section four, of the bill, it reads near the close:

For the purpose of facilitating the more immediate construction of a line of railroads across the State of Iowa, to connect with the Iowa branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company aforesaid, the said Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railroad Company is hereby authorized to connect its line by branch with the line of the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company.

Mr. HARLAN. I will explain on that point. One of these roads runs through one tier of counties east and west through the State, and the other runs through the adjoining tier of counties. The counties in Iowa are usually about twenty-five miles across, so that that branch road will probably be about twenty-five miles, perhaps slightly less or slightly more.

Mr. MORRILL. The inquiry I wish to make is this, whether the Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railroad Company is a company located in Iowa entirely.

Mr. HARLAN. Entirely.

Mr. MORRILL. Then as to the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company, is that a company in Iowa or Missouri?

Mr. HARLAN. All these companies are in Iowa. The whole grant is made in Iowa; not an acre outside of the State.

Mr. MORRILL. My inquiry is whether the railroad with which you propose to connect the Cedar Rapids and Missouri Railroad Company—for it is "hereby authorized to connect its line with the branch of the line of the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company"—is an Iowa road.

Mr. HARLAN. Both are in Iowa.

Mr. MORRILL. My inquiry arose from a supposition that the whole road was in the State of Missouri.

Mr. HARLAN. No; neither of these lines is in the State of Missouri. Neither of the branch roads contemplated is in Missouri.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 474) to amend an act relative to the public printing was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the order of the day, being Senate bill No. 265, to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, and for other purposes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to pass by the order temporarily in order that a resolution I introduced yesterday morning calling for information may be taken up.

Mr. ANTHONY. I presume this bill will not occupy fifteen minutes. I prefer that we shall go on with it; we have got nearly through with it. What is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question pending is on the amendment of the Committee on Printing as amended, as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. To meet the objection raised by the Senator from New Hampshire, I will modify the amendment, with the assent of the Senate, so that the first section of the substitute shall read as follows:

"That hereafter, instead of furnishing manuscript copies of the documents usually accompanying their annual reports to each House of Congress, the heads of the several Departments of Government shall transmit them on or before the 1st day of November in each year to the Superintendent of Public Printing, who shall cause to be printed the usual number, and in addition thereto one thousand copies for the use of the Senate and two thousand for the use of the House of Representatives; and that it shall be the duty of the Joint Committee on Printing to appoint some competent person who shall edit and select such portions of the documents so placed in their hands as shall in the judgment of the committee be desirable for popular distribution, and to prepare an alphabetical index to the same.

Mr. HALE. I want to ask the Senator from Rhode Island if that obviates the difficulty in regard to every other year. There can be no Joint Committee on Printing existing on the 1st day or November in each alternate year. How does he propose to dispose of it, say after the 4th of March next? From the 4th of March next until the 1st of December following, there will be no Joint Committee on Printing, and cannot be.

Mr. ANTHONY. The documents are to be given to the Superintendent of Public Printing, who is to print the usual number of the documents in full. Then the Joint Committee on Printing are to appoint some suitable person to edit an abridgment in a single volume for popular distribution. It is not necessary that that should be done before the 1st of December, when Congress meets, because the type will be standing which has been used to print the documents in full, and the committee can then designate such portion of them as they think ought to be selected for popular distribution.

Mr. HALE. Does not the bill as it now stands require the Joint Committee on Printing to appoint a person to edit this first volume?

Mr. ANTHONY. That person will be appointed permanently. It is not necessary that he shall be appointed every year. That person will be appointed and retain his position until some one else is put in his place, the same as all the officers of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me still that there should be some regulation made for his compensation if he is to be a permanent officer. I do not exactly like the idea of putting ourselves in the guardianship of one single individual, and leaving it to his discretion to say what document shall be printed and what shall not.

Mr. ANTHONY. The bill does not do so. The Joint Committee on Printing select the documents that are to be selected, but some person must prepare an alphabetical index. Of course the committee cannot do that.

Mr. HALE. Then it comes back to the same difficulty. The Joint Committee on Printing do not exist every alternate year.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not necessary to make the selection until the 1st of December. The documents will be given to the Superintendent of Public Printing in November; they will be in the process of printing when we meet; and then the Joint Committee on Printing will select those portions which are to be for popular distribution. The only object is to save the expense of publishing a large amount of useless matter, and to prepare an index. The cost of that will be very small indeed. The committee did not think it proper to fix the compensation, for we hardly know what it will be, but it will be very small, a few hundred dollars perhaps.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to have the bill read on its third reading, that we may see how it now stands. It seems to me the gentleman has hardly got it in a practical shape.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The third reading of the bill will be at large.

The bill received its third reading at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter, instead of furnishing manuscript copies of the documents usually accompanying their annual reports to each House of Congress, the heads of the several Departments of Government shall transmit them, on or before the 1st day of November in each year, to the Superintendent of Public Printing, who shall cause to be printed the usual number, and in addition thereto one thousand copies for the use of the Senate and two thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and that it shall be the duty of the Joint Committee on Printing to appoint some competent person, who shall edit and select such portions of the documents so placed in their hands as shall, in the judgment of the committee, be desirable for popular distribution, and to prepare an alphabetical index to the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint some competent person to edit the printing of the official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the heads of the several Departments of Government to furnish the Superintendent of Public Printing with copies of their respective reports, on or before the third Monday in November in each year.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of Public Printing to print the President's message, the reports of the heads of Departments, and the abridgment of accompanying documents prepared under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing suitably bound; and that, in addition to the number now required by law, and unless otherwise ordered by either House of Congress, it shall be his duty to print ten thousand copies of the same for the use of the Senate and twenty-five thousand copies for the use of the House, and to deliver the same to the proper officer of each House, respectively, on or before the third Wednesday in December following the assembling of Congress, or as soon thereafter as practicable. And further, it shall also be the duty of the said Superintendent to cause to be printed and stitched in paper covers twenty-five hundred copies of the annual reports of the Executive Departments for the use of said Departments, respectively, and also one thousand copies of the reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, Commissioner of Pensions, Commissioner of the Internal Revenue, and such number of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to be bound, not exceeding three thousand copies, as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior, for their use, respectively; and also five hundred copies of the reports of the superintendent of the Washington aqueduct, architect of the Capitol extension, Metropolitan Police Board, Third Auditor of the Treasury, and of the Insane Asylum, Columbia Institute, and Commissioner of Public Buildings, respectively, for their use, and one hundred copies of the report of the Bureau of Engineers, for the use of said bureau. And he shall not print any greater number of said reports unless otherwise directed by either House of Congress.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That seven thousand copies of the Commercial Relations, annually prepared under the direction of the Secretary of State, be printed and distributed as follows, viz: the usual number (one thousand five hundred and fifty) for the Houses of Congress; four hundred and fifty for the State Department; two thousand for the use of the members of the Senate; and three thousand for the use of members of the House.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the annual report of the Postmaster General of offers received and contracts for conveying the mails, in compliance with the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth sections of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1836, be no longer printed, unless specially ordered by either House of Congress; and that such portion of the above-mentioned act as authorized the said publication be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate to furnish the Superintendent of Public Printing with correct copies of all laws and joint resolutions as soon as possible after their approval by the President of the United States, and that the Superintendent shall immediately cause to be printed separately the usual number for the use of the two Houses of Congress; and, in addition thereto, he shall cause to be printed and bound, at the close of each session of Congress, three thousand copies thereof for the use of the Senate and ten thousand copies for the use of the House, with a complete alphabetical index, prepared under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That section seven of the joint resolution in relation to the public printing, approved June 23, 1860, be so amended as to require the Superintendent of Public Printing to advertise only in two newspapers published in the cities of New York, Cincinnati, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, for thirty days prior to the 1st day of November of each year, for proposals for furnishing the paper necessary for the execution of the public printing.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That all lithographing and engraving, where the probable total cost of the maps or plates illustrating or accompanying any one work exceeds $250, shall be awarded to the lowest and best bidder for the interests of the Government, due regard being paid to the execution of the work, after due advertisement by the Superintendent of Public Printing, under direction of the Joint Committee on Printing; Provided, That the Joint Committee on Public Printing be authorized to empower the Superintendent of Public Printing to make immediate contracts for engraving whenever, in their opinion, the exigencies of the public service will not justify waiting for advertisement and award.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That whenever any person may desire extra copies of any document printed at the Government printing office, by authority of law, and shall notify the Superintendent of Public Printing of the number of copies desired previous to its being put to press, and shall pay, in advance, the estimated cost thereof to said Superintendent, the Superintendent shall be authorized, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, to furnish such extra copies; and the money so received, together with moneys received by him from the sales of paper shavings and imperfections, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the appropriations for public printing, binding, and paper, respectively, as designated by said Superintendent; and further, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to cause the moneys heretofore deposited by said Superintendent in the Treasury of the United States, being the proceeds of sales of paper shavings and imperfections, to be placed to the credit of the appropriations aforesaid, which said several sums of money shall be subject to the requisition of said Superintendent in the manner now prescribed by law.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That whenever papers relating to foreign affairs shall be communicated to Congress accompanying the annual message of the President, it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of Public Printing to cause to be printed and bound, in addition to the usual number, four thousand copies for the use of the members of the Senate, seven thousand copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, and such number for the Executive Department as the President shall direct.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the forms and style in which the printing or binding ordered by any of the Departments shall be executed, the materials and size of type to be used shall be determined by the Superintendent of Public Printing, having proper regard to economy, workmanship, and the purposes for which the work is needed.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That all laws or parts of laws, joint resolutions or parts of joint resolutions, conflicting with the above provisions, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing why provision is made in the bill for printing two or three thousand copies of the documents that accompany the President's message besides the usual number, when it is provided that the committee shall decide what part of them are worthy of publication and distribution? What is the use of having that number of extra copies of those papers printed?

Mr. ANTHONY. Those papers are very useful in small numbers for public libraries and for preservation for reference. It is necessary to set the type in order to print the usual number, which is fifteen hundred and fifty. Then it costs only the paper and press-work, comparatively a small amount, to print enough extra copies to place them in the chief libraries of the country, where they will remain for reference, and they always have been so printed.

Mr. HALE. I cannot help thinking that this bill has not received that discriminating attention which the chairman of the Committee on Printing usually gives to a bill that he reports. I find in what was the eighth section of the bill as reported a provision that all lithographing and engraving, where the probable total cost of the maps or plates exceeds $250, shall be awarded to the lowest and best bidder "after due advertisement by the Superintendent of Public Printing, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, provided that the Joint Committee on Public Printing be authorized to empower the Superintendent of Public Printing to make immediate contracts for engraving whenever, in their opinion, the exigencies of the public service will not justify waiting for advertisement and award." That looks to the existence of the Committee on Printing as a permanent body, whereas in every other year, from March to December there is no such committee.

Again, I find in another section that whenever any person may desire extra copies of any document, and shall notify the Superintendent of the number wanted and shall pay in advance the estimated cost, "the Superintendent shall be authorized, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, to furnish such extra copies." That looks to the Joint Committee on Public Printing as a permanent body, and I think the same thing occurs in one or two other instances. It seems to me that it would be unsafe to pass a bill as a permanent law regulating the public printing, leaving it open to the control and direction of the Committee on Printing, when that committee are not in existence nearly half the time, or at least a third of the time, during the two years of a Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. That committee is in existence all the time when there is any printing going on, except during the month of November in every other year, and practically then the supervision of the committee will not be needed until the first Monday in December.

The ninth section of the bill as amended, to which the Senator has referred, provides that all lithographing and engraving, when the probable cost exceeds $250, shall be advertised and awarded to the lowest and best bidder. That is the present law, but it is found in some cases where a document is ordered to be printed—and such documents are always ordered to be printed in the course of the session, and never when the committee is not in existence—that the amount of lithographing or engraving is very small indeed, and the delay of advertising and examining the bids would be of more consequence than the whole cost of the engraving. It was therefore thought best to give the Superintendent of Public Printing, under the supervision of the joint committee, the power to waive the advertisement in such cases; but if the Senator objects to that, we can empower the Superintendent of Public Printing to waive the provision of advertising, although if the committee is not in existence the section as it stands certainly can do no harm.

The other section to which the Senator has referred is that whenever any persons desire extra copies of a document, and pay the money in advance to the Superintendent of Public Printing, the copies desired shall be printed. It was thought possible that if it was made obligatory on the Superintendent to print any number of copies that might be required, the orders might sometimes be so numerous as to impede the public service. In that case, of course, it would be desirable to refuse the orders; and it was thought best, with that view, to retain the supervision in the hands of the committee. If, however, Senators think it more desirable that it should be left to the Superintendent alone, that will be quite as satisfactory to us. The Superintendent is certainly a very competent man, and, I will take occasion now to say, one of the most economical men connected with the Government. His continual object is to do the work in the cheapest manner possible, and to cut down the printing as much as he can.

Mr. HALE. I have no particular objection to this bill; but I looked at it and saw the things which I have stated, which occurred to me as exceptional and objectionable.

Mr. ANTHONY. They all occurred to the committee, and were fully considered in consultation with the Superintendent. The joint committee of both Houses have had several meetings over it, and the objections which the Senator raises occurred to us, and were explained by us in the way I have endeavored to explain them to him.

The bill was passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe the next business in order is Senate bill No. 132, which was made the special order for to-day at one o'clock, being the Pacific railroad bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 132) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, is the special order of the day, and it is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state how the matter stands. Several weeks ago the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] introduced a bill, No. 132, which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. That committee took it under consideration, and reported it back to the Senate with various amendments; but since that report was made the committee have had the subject under consideration again, and the result has been the submission to the Senate of an amendment in lieu of the original bill, and as it covers the whole ground covered by the bill as originally introduced, I ask to have the reading of the original bill dispensed with, and to have the amendment only read to the Senate at this time. I will further remark to the Senate that this amendment covers the entire ground embraced by the Pacific railroad charter of 1862, with various other provisions which the committee have thought necessary to be incorporated in order to form one complete and harmonious system. I hope, therefore, that the amendment only will be read, as it is intended as a substitute for the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment alone will be read, unless some Senator desires the reading of the original bill.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the stockholders of the corporation known as the Union Pacific Railroad Company, created by the act approved July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and all persons who may become associated with them as stockholders, pursuant to this act, and their successors and assigns, are hereby confirmed and constituted a body-politic and corporate, in fact and in law, by that name; and by that name shall have perpetual succession, and shall be capable in law of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded, defending and being defended in all courts of law and equity of the United States, and may make and have a common seal. And said company is hereby authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, finish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph, with the appurtenances thereto, from a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Smoky Hill Fork of the Republican or Kansas river, in the State of Kansas, and the north margin of the valley of the Platte river, in the Territory of Nebraska, to the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada, upon the route and terms hereinafter mentioned, and is hereby vested with all the powers, privileges, and immunities necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act as herein set forth. That the capital stock of said company shall consist of one million shares, of $100 each, instead of $1,000 each, as provided in said original act, and two thousand shares shall be the greatest amount which any one person may hereafter subscribe for or hold at any time, or for which certificates of shares shall in any case be issued or recognized by said company. That said company shall cause books to be kept open to receive subscriptions to the capital stock of said company until the entire capital of $100,000,000 shall be subscribed at the general office of said company in the city of New York, and in each of the cities of Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and San Francisco, at such places therein as may be designated by the President of the United States, and in such other cities or towns as may be directed by him; and no subscription for such stock shall hereafter be deemed valid unless the subscriber therefor shall, at the time of subscribing, pay to the treasurer of the company an amount per share subscribed by him equal to the amount per share previously paid by the then existing stockholders. The said company, by its directors or its stockholders, shall, from and after the passage of this act, make assessments upon all the stockholders of not less than five dollars per share, at intervals of not less than six months from and after the passage of this act, until the par value of all shares subscribed for shall be fully paid; and money only shall be received for any such assessment, or for any portion of such capital stock; but bonds of said company, upon which interest is guaranteed by the United States, as hereinafter provided, may, at the option of the holders thereof, be converted at any time by such holders at their par value into full-paid stock of said company; and certificates of shares thereof shall be issued, not, however, to exceed in amount to any one person the above limitation of two thousand shares; and upon every such conversion of bonds into capital stock, all liability of the United States for the payment of interest on the bonds converted shall cease; but the capital stock of said company shall not, by reason of such conversion, be increased so as to exceed the actual cost of the road, its fixtures, appurtenances, and rolling stock. The stock of the said company shall be deemed personal property, and shall be transferable at the general office of the company, in the city of New York, and at such other transfer offices as the directors shall establish, according to such rules and regulations as may be provided in the by-laws. The general office of said company shall be kept in the city of New York, and all meetings of stockholders shall be held at the said office. Annual meetings of the stockholders shall be held at the said general office on the second Wednesday of October in each year, for the election of directors and the transaction of any other business of the corporation; and at every such meeting the directors and officers of the company shall make to the stockholders a full statement of the condition of the affairs of the company. From and after the next annual meeting, to be held on the second Wednesday of October next, as herein provided, there shall be twenty-one directors of said company, one third of which number shall be elected annually, and for the term of three years; and at the next annual meeting of the stockholders there shall be drawn by lot, by the inspectors hereinafter provided for, from the names of the then directors, the names of seven directors, who shall continue directors one year; and the names of seven others, who shall continue directors two years; and seven stockholders shall be elected and shall continue directors three years. And the directors may, at any time, fill any vacancy in their board until the next annual meeting, when such vacancy shall be filled by the stockholders. The election of directors shall be by ballot, and be held under the supervision of three inspectors, to be appointed by the stockholders. The polls for the election shall be opened at eleven o'clock a. m., and continue open until all parties present entitled shall have had an opportunity to vote; but shall be finally closed and ended within five days from the opening thereof; and each share shall be entitled to one vote, to be voted by the owner in person, or by his duly constituted attorney or proxy; but no director, officer, or employee of the company shall act as the attorney or proxy of any shareholder, at any annual or other meeting of the stockholders. At the time of the election of directors by the stockholders, two additional directors shall be appointed by the President of the United States, who shall act with the board of directors, and be denominated Government directors. Any vacancy happening in whose places shall be filled by the President of the United States. The Government directors shall not be shareholders in said company. The directors so chosen shall, as soon as may be after their election, elect from their own number a president and vice president, and shall also elect a treasurer and secretary. No person shall be a director of said company unless he shall be a bona fide owner of at least fifty shares of stock in said company, except the two directors appointed by the President; and every person now a subscriber to said capital stock, for each share of $1,000 herebefore subscribed, and on which there has been paid not less than ten per cent, shall be entitled to a certificate for ten shares of $100 each, on the surrender of his original certificate; and all future subscribers shall be entitled to one share for every $100 of valid subscription they shall severally make, as herein provided; and upon each of such certificates there shall be indorsed and certified the amount paid upon subscription by the holder up to and including the date of such certificate. Said company, at any regular meeting of the stockholders or any called meeting, at which not less than a majority in interest of the stockholders shall be present in person or by proxy, which majority shall constitute a quorum to do business, shall have power to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper touching the disposition of the stock, property, estates, and effects of the company, not inconsistent with this act or any act of Congress, the transfer of shares, the term of office, duties, and conduct of their officers and servants, and all matters whatsoever which may appertain to the concerns of said company; and the said board of directors shall have power to appoint such engineers, agents, and subordinates as may from time to time be necessary to carry into effect the objects of this act, and do all acts and things touching the location and construction of said railroad and telegraph. Said directors may require payment of subscriptions to the capital stock, after due notice, at such more frequent times and in such greater proportions than hereinbefore provided as they shall deem necessary to complete the railroad and telegraph. And a majority of said directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The secretary and treasurer shall give bonds, with such security as the said board shall from time to time require, and shall hold their offices at the will and pleasure of the directors; and the directors shall hold their offices until their successors are qualified. The Government directors shall be ex officio members of all standing committees, and shall from time to time report to the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to any inquiries he may make of them touching the condition, management, and progress of the work; shall communicate to the Secretary of the Interior at any time such information as should be in possession of the Department; and for this purpose they or either of them shall have free access at all reasonable times to the books, papers, and archives of the company. They shall, while absent from home attending to their duties, be paid their actual traveling expenses and compensation, at the rate of eight dollars a day, for the time thus actually employed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said company shall cause notice to be published in one or more newspapers of general circulation in each of the cities hereinbefore mentioned, by not less than ten conspicuous insertions thereof in each such newspaper, of all calls or assessments upon the capital stock, and the time when the same shall be payable, and also of all special meetings of the stockholders; and any five directors, or the owners of one tenth in interest of the capital stock paid in, may in like manner call and convene special meetings of the stockholders. In case any stockholder shall fail to pay any assessment which shall be made, and of which due notice shall have been given as aforesaid, at the time when the same shall be payable, or within thirty days next thereafter, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum for any elapsed portion of such thirty days, the shares of such delinquent stockholder, on which such assessment shall not have been paid, and all payments thereon shall be absolutely and ipso facto forfeited to the said company; and no stockholder or proxy shall be entitled or allowed to vote at any meeting of stockholders on any share or shares on which any such assessment shall be due and unpaid. All contracts for labor and services, materials of every description, and for transportation, which may be made by or on behalf of said company, shall be terminable at the pleasure of said company, or of the directors thereof, by notice in writing to the other contracting parties, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns; and upon and after service of such notice, all liability and obligation on account thereof, on the part of the company, shall cease and determine, except in so far as performance shall be by either party required during the six months next succeeding such service; and all such contracts of said company shall contain or be deemed to contain a clause providing for such termination thereof. And said company shall complete and fully equip its line of road and telegraph as provided in this act on or before the 31st day of December, A. D. 1877, except in so far as such completion may be necessarily delayed by tumors or unavoidable obstacles or impediments which shall render further time indispensable; in which case such further time may be determined and granted by the President of the United States, not, however, to exceed five years.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the right of way through the public lands of the United States be, and the same is hereby, granted to said company for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line; and the right, power, and authority are hereby given to said company to take from the public lands, adjacent to the line of said road, earth, stone, timber, and other materials for the construction thereof; said right of way is granted to the extent of two hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass over the public land; and all necessary grounds for stations, buildings, workshops, depots, machine shops, switches, side and second tracks, turn tables, water stations, and other appurtenances or appliances proper for the construction, operating, and maintenance of said railroad and telegraph. The United States shall extinguish as rapidly as may be the Indian titles to all lands falling under the operation of this act and required for said right of way and grants herein made, or made in the act to which this is an amendment. The said company is hereby authorized and empowered to enter upon, purchase, take, and hold any lands and premises, other than such public lands that may be necessary and proper for the construction and working of said road, not exceeding in width two hundred feet on each side of the center line of their railroad, unless a greater width shall be requisite for the purpose of excavation or embankment; and also any lands or premises which may be necessary and proper for stations, buildings, workshops, depots, machine shops, switches, side and second tracks, turn tables, and water stations necessary in the construction, operating, and maintenance of said road; and the said company shall, furthermore, have the right to cut and remove trees or other materials which might, by falling, incumber its road-bed, though standing or being more than two hundred feet from the line of said road. And in case the owner of such lands or premises and the said company cannot agree as to the damages sustained by the owners thereof for the premises so taken, or to be taken, for the use of said road, the damages thereby sustained shall be determined by the appraisal of three disinterested commissioners, who may be appointed upon application by any party to any judge of a court of record in any of the Territories in which the lands or premises to be taken lie; and said commissioners, in their assessments of damages, shall appraise such premises at what would have been the value thereof if the road had not been built; and shall also deduct from the damages to be awarded to the applicant for the same any increase in the value, due to the construction of the road, of the premises retained by him, provided such premises formed a portion of those taken; and upon return into court of such appraisal, and upon the payment to the clerk thereof, or to the parties entitled, of the amounts so awarded by the commissioners, (such clerk to hold the same in trust for the use and benefit of the owner thereof,) said premises shall be deemed to be taken by said company, which shall thereby acquire full title to the same for the purpose aforesaid. And either party feeling aggrieved at said assessment, may, within thirty days after the same has been filed with the clerk, file an appeal therefrom, and demand a jury of twelve men to estimate the damage sustained; but such appeal shall not interfere with the rights of said company to enter upon the premises taken, or to do any act necessary in the construction of its road. And said party appealing shall give bonds, with sufficient surety or sureties for the payment of any costs that may arise upon such appeal. And in case the party appealing does not obtain a verdict increasing or diminishing, as the case may be, the award of the commissioners, such party shall pay the whole cost incurred by the appellee, as well as its own. And the payment into court, for the use of the owner of said premises taken, of a sum equal to that finally awarded shall be held to vest in said company the title of said land, and the right to use and occupy the same for the construction, maintaining, and operating of said road. And in case any of the lands to be taken as aforesaid shall be held by any infant, female covert, non-compos, insane person, or person residing without the Territory within which the lands to be taken lie, or persons subject to any legal disability, the court may appoint a guardian for any party under any disqualification, to appear in proper person, who shall give bonds, with sufficient surety or sureties for the proper and faithful execution of his trust, and who may represent in court the person disqualified as aforesaid from appearing, when the same proceeding shall be had in reference to the appraisal of the premises to be taken for the use of said company, and with the same effect as have been already described. And the title of the company to the land taken by virtue of this act shall not be affected nor impaired by reason of any failure by any guardian to discharge faithfully his trust. And in case any party shall have a right or claim to any lands for a term of years, or any interest therein, in possession, reversion, or remainder, the value of any such estate less than a fee simple shall be estimated and determined in the manner herein set forth. And in case it shall be necessary for the company to enter upon lands which are unoccupied, and of which there is no apparent owner or claimant, it may proceed to take and use the same for the purpose of said railroad, and may institute proceedings in manner described for the purpose of ascertaining the value of and acquiring a title to the same; but the judge shall determine the kind of notice to be given such owner or owners, and he may in his discretion appoint an agent or guardian to represent such owner or owners in case of his or their incapacity or non-appearance. In case no claimant shall appear within three years from the time of the opening of said road across any land, all claim to damages against said company shall be barred. It shall be competent for the legal guardian of any infant, or any other person under guardianship, to agree with the company as to damages sustained by reason of the taking of any lands of any such person under disability, as aforesaid, for the use as aforesaid, and upon such agreement being made the said guardian shall have full power to make and execute a conveyance thereof to the said company, which shall vest the title thereto in the said company.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the right and authority granted to said company in said original act to take from the public lands adjoining said road stone, timber, and other materials for the construction of the road, said company is hereby authorized and empowered to take and use any coal or iron ores lying within any of the public lands upon the general route of the proposed road, and within the limits of ten miles on each side of the line thereof, and which may be made available either in the construction of or future use and operation of said road. And in case said company is desirous of becoming purchasers of the fee of such lands containing coal and iron ores, patents therefor shall be issued to said company by the Government of the United States, at the price at which Government lands without minerals are sold at the time such patents issue. Provided, That said company shall, within ten years, make its selection of the land it desires to purchase, and that the lands so selected shall not exceed in area one hundred thousand acres.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That said company shall locate its said railroad and telegraph line on the most direct and central practicable route, having reference to the construction, operation, and maintenance of said road through the territories of the United States between said initial point on said one hundredth meridian and the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada, to connect with the line of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, and that such location shall be made upon and from actual surveys upon such route and with such minutiae as the President of the United States shall approve. That within two years after the passage of this act the said company shall designate such general route of said road, as near as may be, and shall file a map of the same in the Department of the Interior; whereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the lands within fifteen miles of such designated route to be withdrawn from preemption, private entry, or sale; and in case any portion of said line shall be located, and such location be approved by the President of the United States before such designation of the entire route shall be made, the lands within fifteen miles thereof shall in like manner be withdrawn as aforesaid, and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the said lands hereinbefore granted to be surveyed and set apart as may be necessary for the purposes herein named whenever a portion of said line of road shall be finally located, and said company are authorized to modify and change the location of any portion or portions of its line, with the approval of the President of the United States, and thereupon the provisions herein mentioned as to withdrawal, survey, and setting apart of said lands shall be deemed to refer and apply to the land within fifteen miles of such changed location of the road: Provided, however, That the said initial point on the one hundredth meridian shall be established as hereinbefore provided, so as to make the most practicable connection between the main line of said company and the several lines of road to be built from said one hundredth meridian to the Missouri river, and may be changed by the Congress of the United States only.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, granted to said company for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, and munitions of war and public stores thereon, every alternate section of the public land designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad, on the line thereof and within the limits of ten miles on each side of said road, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a preemption or homestead claim may not have been attached at the time the line of road is definitely fixed; but if by reason of sale by the United States or by preemption or homestead right attaching to any such alternate section or part of a section so hereby granted to said company, or if from any other cause the said company shall be unable to locate or receive the whole of five full alternate sections per mile for each mile on each side of said road, it shall in either case be lawful for said company to select, locate, and receive patents for so much of the other lands of the United States lying within twenty miles of each side of said road as will make up the quantity granted to said company to ten sections per mile for each and every mile of said railroad so constructed. But all mineral lands, except those containing mines of iron or coal, shall be excluded from the operation of this section, although where the same shall contain timber the timber thereon is hereby granted to said company. And all such lands so granted by this section, which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed, shall be subject to settlement and preemption like other public lands, at a price not exceeding $1 25 per acre, to be paid to said company. The title of the lands thus granted to said company, upon the construction of said road, shall remain in the United States, subject to the provisions of this act, and the lands shall not be subject to private entry, preemption sale, homestead exemption, or other disposition, until after said company shall have filed the maps of the survey and location of the route of said railroad, and until said lands shall be set apart and confirmed to said company, any act of Congress heretofore passed in reference to the disposition of said lands to the contrary notwithstanding. And the term mineral land, wherever the same occurs in this act and the act to which this is an amendment, shall not be construed to include mines of iron or of coal.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever said company shall have completed any one section of forty consecutive miles of any part of said railroad and telegraph line, eastward of the eastern base of the Rocky mountains, ready for the service contemplated by this act, supplied with all necessary drains, culverts, viaducts, crossings, sidings, bridges, turnouts, watering places, depots, equipments, furniture, and all other appurtenances of a first-class railroad, three commissioners, to be appointed by the President of the United States to examine the same and report to him in relation thereto, shall proceed to perform their duty; and if it shall appear to him that forty consecutive miles of said railroad and telegraph line have been completed and equipped in all respects as required by this act, then upon certificates of said commissioners to that effect patents shall issue conveying the right and title of said lands to said company, on each side of the road, so far as the same is completed, to the amount aforesaid; and patents shall in like manner issue as each section of not less than forty consecutive miles of said railroad and telegraph line is completed east of the eastern base of the Rocky mountains; and also as each section of not less than twenty consecutive miles thereof west of said eastern base is completed, upon like certificates of commissioners so to be appointed. Any vacancies occurring in any such board of commissioners by death, resignation, or otherwise, shall be filled by the President of the United States; none of which commissioners shall be stockholders in any railroad company entitled to any of the benefits or privileges granted by this act: Provided, however, That no such commissioners shall be appointed by the President of the United States until there shall be presented to him a statement, verified on oath by the president of said company, that the proper number of miles have been so completed, in the manner required by this act, and setting forth with certainty the points where such distance begins and where the same ends; which oath shall be taken before a judge of a court of record; but he may appoint as many such boards of commissioners as the public interest may, in his opinion, require, and as shall be desired by said company; and all such certificates shall, after being presented to the President as aforesaid, be filed and deposited with the Secretary of the Interior. The rails and other iron used in the construction and equipment of the said road shall be of American manufacture, of the best quality, except so much thereof as shall be needed for two years next after the approval of this act.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no United States bonds shall be issued under the act of which this is an amendment; but the said company may make, execute, and issue its own first mortgage bonds, to be signed by its president and secretary, and sealed with the corporate seal of the company, to the following amounts in respect of the following parts of said road, and under the following conditions, to wit: said company may make and execute, as aforsaid, its first mortgage bonds in sums of $1,000 each, payable in thirty years after date, bearing six per cent. per annum interest, payable in gold or silver coin semi-annually, in the city of New York, to the amount of twenty-four of such bonds for each mile of its railroad east of the said eastern base of the Rocky mountains. For each mile of its railroad lying between said eastern base of the Rocky mountains and the western boundary line of the present Territory of Nevada, said company may make and execute, as aforsaid, its first mortgage bonds in sums of $1,000 each, payable in thirty years after date, bearing six per cent. per annum interest, payable as aforsaid, in the following amounts, to wit, ninety-six of such bonds for each mile from said eastern base of the Rocky mountains, for one hundred and fifty miles westwardly on the line of the said railroad; and ninety-six of such bonds for each mile upon that part of the said railroad which shall lie within the Territory of Nevada, and which shall fall within the distance of one hundred and fifty miles eastwardly from the western base of the Sierra Nevada mountains, if any part of said one hundred and fifty miles shall be found to lie within said Territory of Nevada; which western base shall be ascertained and fixed by the President of the United States. And for each mile of railroad lying between the western end of the said mountain district of one hundred and fifty miles from the eastern base of the Rocky mountains and the western boundary line of said Territory of Nevada, or the eastern end of said mountain district of one hundred and fifty miles from the western base of the Sierra Nevada mountains, if any part of said last named district shall be found to lie within the Territory of Nevada, said company may make, execute, and issue as aforsaid its first mortgage bonds, in like sums payable as aforsaid with the like rate of interest payable as aforsaid, forty-eight of said bonds for each mile of railroad. And in case it shall be found that said Nevada mountain district of one hundred and fifty miles shall lie wholly or in part in the State of California, the proper company may, for each mile of railroad on its line lying between said western base of the Sierra Nevada mountains and the eastern boundary line of California, make, execute, and issue in manner aforsaid its corporate mortgage bonds in like sums, payable as aforsaid, with the same rate of interest, payable as aforsaid, to the amount of ninety-six of said bonds. The bonds so to be made and issued by said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall have proper and usual interest coupons attached thereto, payable in said city of New York semi-annually in gold or silver coin.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That said Union Pacific Railroad Company, further to secure the payment of all such bonds, shall, at the time of making and executing the first bond or bonds under this act, make and execute a mortgage or deed of trust, in such manner and form as the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury shall approve, embracing all and singular the whole line of said railroad and telegraph, the right of way thereof, the rolling stock, buildings, fixtures, and appurtenances of every kind and description, all franchises, and all railroad property of said company, acquired or to be acquired, except the lands granted by said original act or by this act as alternate sections, which lands, so far as not embraced in the right of way, shall be unaffected by said mortgage. Such mortgage, before it shall become operative, shall be approved by the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall indorse their approval thereon; and the same shall be and remain a security for the holders of said bonds or of said coupons, so far as they shall be respectively entitled to principal or interest thereon; and a duplicate of said mortgage shall be deposited and filed in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury; and said mortgage shall also be registered and recorded in the proper office of the register or recorder of conveyances of land in every county and city in which any part of the line of said railroad shall lie, so soon as such county or city shall by law be provided with such office, but at the expense of said company; and such registration or recording shall have the effect of notifying all third persons of the fact of the existence of said mortgage. Said company may make and issue other bonds, mortgages, or deeds of trust, in such terms, manner, and form as it shall deem expedient, upon any of its property, and may issue and sell the same at any price or rate that may seem good to the board of directors; but no such bond or bonds shall bear a greater rate of interest than seven per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, nor shall such bond or bonds, or mortgage, or any other instrument made by said company, in any way affect the priority of the first mortgage and first mortgage bonds, and interest thereon, hereinbefore provided for; and in such other bonds, mortgages, or deeds of trust, the aforsaid first mortgage and bonds shall be expressly referred to, so that the holder thereof may be notified of the existence of said first mortgage and bonds.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of aiding said company in the construction, completion, and equipment of said railroad and telegraph line from the initial point on the said one hundredth degree of west longitude to its western point of termination on the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada, such first mortgage bonds of said Union Pacific Railroad Company may be produced to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States; and upon the presentation to him of the certificates of the said commissioners of the completion of forty miles or twenty miles, as the case may be, or of consecutive portions exceeding those portions in length, the Secretary of the Treasury shall indorse upon each and every of such first mortgage bonds under his hand the guarantee of the United States of the payment of the interest thereon, in the following words, namely: "The United States hereby undertake and agree with the lawful holder of the within bond to pay the first year's interest accruing thereon, as a gratuity to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the obligor; and to pay the interest accruing thereon after such payment by said obligor." The said certificates of completion shall immediately be deposited and filed in the office of said Secretary of the Treasury, and be there kept and preserved.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all the bonds so guaranteed to be registered in a proper book to be kept in his office for that purpose, in which their respective dates, amounts, numbers, and the names of persons to whom made payable shall be entered; and thereupon such bonds shall be delivered to said company, their authorized agent, or to the lawful holder and owner thereof. And said Secretary shall note upon each of said bonds the certificate under which the same is issued by proper numbers or other distinct mode of identification: Provided, That whenever the chief engineer, the president and the secretary of said company shall certify on their oaths, to be administered by any judge of a court of record, that a certain part, to be described with certainty, not less than five consecutive miles, of the work for the superstructure on any section of twenty consecutive miles within either of the said mountain districts, east of the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada, has been fully done and completed, the company shall be entitled to like bonds, of the tenor aforsaid, subject to all the provisions of this act, at the rate per mile fixed for said districts; such certificates to be previously deposited and filed in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. And thereupon such bonds shall be indorsed, registered, and delivered as aforsaid, and shall be taken and deemed to be of the number of the bonds, but not to exceed that number, hereinbefore stipulated to be guaranteed by the United States for the section of twenty miles within which they may fall, and to be treated in all respects as if they had been granted upon the presentation of the certificates of said commissioners. And any person swearing falsely to any such certificate shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof shall be punished as herein provided in cases of commissioners making or signing false or fraudulent certificates: Provided, nevertheless, That if it is the case that any of the railroad companies entitled to the guarantee of the United States of the interest upon its corporate bonds, herein provided for, has at the time of the approval of this act issued, or shall thereafter issue, any of its own bonds or securities in such form and manner as in law or equity to entitle the same to priority or preference of payment to the said guaranteed bonds, the amount of such corporate bonds outstanding and unsatisfied, or uncancelled, shall be deducted from the amount of such guaranteed bonds to which the company may be entitled; and such an amount only of such guaranteed bonds shall be permitted as, added to such outstanding, unsatisfied, or uncancelled bonds of the company, shall make up the whole amount per mile to which the company would otherwise have been entitled: Provided, That on the surrender of any such corporate bonds to the United States in such manner as to leave any section of railroad and telegraph, continuous and completed, and equipped, as required by this act, entirely free and clear of such prior lien or mortgage, the company shall be entitled to receive in their stead the aforsaid guaranteed bonds to the same amount as if such corporate bonds had not been issued; and the bonds or other securities so surrendered shall remain a security to the United States for the reimbursement of the interest they may pay on such guaranteed bonds issued in their stead: And provided further, That before any bonds shall be so guaranteed by the United States the company claiming them shall present to the Secretary of the Treasury an affidavit of the president and secretary of the company, to be sworn to before the judge of a court of record, setting forth whether said company has issued any such bonds or securities, and if so, particularly describing the same, so as to enable said Secretary to make the deduction herein required; and such affidavit shall then be filed and deposited in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. And any person swearing falsely to any such affidavit shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof shall be punished as aforsaid.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That in case of the nonpayment of any portion of the interest of said guaranteed bonds by the said Union Pacific Railroad Company, at the time and place the same shall be due and payable for the said nineteen years, the United States shall be deemed to have full notice of such default, and the lawful holder of the bonds or coupons shall not be bound to give them any actual notice of such default or to make any demand. But it shall be the duty of said company, in case of its prospective inability to pay any such interest falling due within that period, to notify the Secretary of the Treasury in writing, at least three months before the interest shall fall due, of such inability and of its intention to omit its payment. On the payment by the United States of any interest on said bonds so guaranteed by them, the proper coupons therefor, or other evidence of such payment, shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall hold the same for the use and benefit of the United States; and such interest, and the interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. per annum, shall also be and remain a lien on all the property embraced in said first mortgage in favor of the United States, who, as to the interest so paid by them, and such interest thereon, (except the said one year's interest,) shall be held to be subrogated to all the rights and equities of the original bondholder or bondholders.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the grants of land mentioned in said act, the grants made and the guarantee given by the present act, are upon the condition and with the intent that said company shall pay said bonds and the interest thereon as the same shall fall due, (except that the United States are to pay the first year's interest as aforsaid,) and shall keep said railroad and telegraph lines in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over their telegraph lines, and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon their railroads for the Government whenever required so to do by any Department thereof, and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforsaid, at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same service; and one half of the compensation for the services rendered for the Government shall be applied to the repayment of the interest it may pay upon said guaranteed bonds, the balance of such interest to remain a mortgage or lien as aforsaid; and on the condition and with the intent, further, that said company shall keep faithful and true accounts of all the receipts upon their lines of road and telegraph, and shall, after deducting all the expenses of running and operating said lines, apply the balance of such receipts toward the payment of the interest on said bonds; and that no dividend exceeding five per cent. on their stock shall be paid until the United States shall have been reimbursed in gold or silver coin, and such services, for all payments of interest under said guarantee and the said interest thereon.

LEAVENWORTH, PAWNEE, AND WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That, for the purposes herein mentioned, the corporation created and chartered by the State of Kansas as the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company, is hereby authorized to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river at the mouth of the Kansas river, on the south side thereof, so as to connect with the Pacific railroad of Missouri to the aforsaid initial point on the one hundredth degree of longitude from Greenwich, as herein provided. And for and in aid of such purpose the said company may do and perform, in reference to its said road, and the construction, equipment, maintenance, and enjoyment thereof all and singular the several acts and things hereinbefore provided, authorized, or granted to be done by the said Union Pacific Railroad Company, and shall be entitled to similar and like grants, benefits, immunities, guarantees, acts, and things to be done and performed by the Government of the United States, by the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Interior, or by commissioners, in reference to it and its line of railroad and telegraph; and subject to the like terms, conditions, restrictions, and regulations hereinbefore contained relating to said Union Pacific Railroad Company, so far as such terms, conditions, restrictions, and regulations are applicable to and consistent with the charter of said Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company as the said charter now is or may hereafter be, and with the laws of the State of Kansas, and so far as such terms, conditions, restrictions, and regulations relate to that portion of the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph line between said initial point and said eastern base of the Rocky mountains. And in case the general route or line of road from the Missouri river to the Rocky mountains should be so located as to require a departure northwardly from the proposed line of said Kansas railroad before it reaches the meridian of longitude aforsaid, the location of said Kansas road shall be made so as to conform thereto; and said railroad through Kansas shall be so located between the mouth of the Kansas river as aforsaid and the aforsaid point, on the one hundredth meridian of longitude, that the several railroads from Missouri and Iowa, herein authorized to connect with the same, can make connection within the limits prescribed in this act: Provided, That the same can be done without deviating from the general direction of the whole line to the Pacific coast. The route in Kansas west of the meridian of Fort Riley to the aforsaid point, on the one hundredth meridian of longitude, to be subject to the approval of the President of the United States, and to be determined by him on actual survey. And said Kansas company may proceed to build said railroad to the aforsaid point, on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich. The said Kansas company shall complete and equip not less than one hundred miles of its said railroad and telegraph within two years from the time of filing their assent to the provisions of the act of which this is an amendment, and one hundred miles thereof each year thereafter until the whole shall be completed, commencing at the mouth of the Kansas river as aforsaid.

OMAHA AND SIOUX CITY BRANCHES.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the said Union Pacific Railroad Company is hereby authorized and required to construct a single line of railroad and telegraph from a point on the western boundary of the State of Iowa, to be fixed by the President of the United States if not already fixed, upon the most direct and practicable route, to be subject to his approval, to said initial point on said one hundredth meridian of longitude; and whenever there shall be a line of railroad fully completed and equipped through Minnesota or Iowa to Sioux City, on the Missouri river, said Union Pacific Railroad Company is hereby authorized and required to construct a railroad and telegraph from said Sioux City, upon the most direct and practicable route, to intersect and unite with the said railroad from said western boundary of Iowa, at such point thereon as the President of the United States shall fix, not further west than the said one hundredth meridian of longitude, and to construct the same at a rate of not less than one hundred miles each year, from and after the time when any such road shall be built through Minnesota or Iowa to said Sioux City, as aforesaid; and for and in aid of such purposes, the said Union Pacific Railroad Company may do and perform in reference to each of said roads provided for in this section, and in reference to the construction, equipment, maintenance, and enjoyment thereof, all and singular the several acts and things hereinbefore provided, authorized, granted, or required to be done by said company; and shall be entitled to similar and like grants, benefits, immunities, guarantees, acts, and things to be done and performed by the Government of the United States, by the President of the United States, the Secretaries of the Treasury and of the Interior, or by commissioners, and be subject to like terms, conditions, restrictions, and regulations hereinbefore contained, relating to that portion of the said Union Pacific railroad and telegraph line between said initial point and said eastern base of the Rocky mountains, so far as such acts and things, grants, benefits, immunities, and guarantees are applicable to said two roads or either of them; the route of each of said roads to be subject to the approval of the President of the United States. And said company shall complete and equip not less than one hundred miles of the railroad and telegraph line first required to be built by this section within two years from and after filing its assent to the provisions of this act, and not less than one hundred miles each year thereafter until the whole of said railroad and telegraph line shall be fully completed and equipped.

The said company shall complete and equip not less than fifty miles of said road within two years after filing its assent to the provisions of this act, and not less than fifty miles thereof within each term of two years thereafter, until the whole of said road is fully completed and equipped; and shall, within one year from the approval of this act, deposit and file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a map of its railroad route between the points aforesaid.

SACRAMENTO, STOCKTON, AND SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD COMPANY.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That Charles McLaughlin, Alexander H. Houston, Henry N. Newhall, Peter Donahue, Benjamin F. Mann, William H. Dillon, J. B. Hinkle, W. Haywood, E. S. Holden, H. B. Underhill, Austin Sperry, William B. Carr, Josiah Johnson, George McDonald, and their associates, may organize themselves as a corporation, under the laws of the State of California, under the name and by the title of the "Sacramento, Stockton, and San Francisco Railroad Company." The corporation thus to be organized shall have authority to build its railroad and telegraph from Sacramento, via Stockton, the Alameda valley, and Oakland, to the island of Yerba Buena, in the harbor of San Francisco, which shall be the western terminus of the Pacific railroad; and for and in aid of such purpose, when formed, may do and perform in reference to its said road, and the construction and equipment thereof, all and singular the several acts and things hereinbefore provided, authorized, or granted to be done by the aforesaid Union Pacific Railroad Company, and shall be entitled to similar and like grants, benefits, immunities, guarantees, acts, and things to be done and performed by the Government of the United States, by the President of the United States, the Secretaries of the Treasury and of the Interior, or by commissioners, in reference to it and its line of railroad and telegraph, and be subject to the like terms, conditions, restrictions, requirements, and regulations hereinbefore contained, relating to that portion of the said Union Pacific railroad lying east of the said eastern base of the Rocky mountains, consistent with the charter of said Sacramento, Stockton, and San Francisco Railroad Company, as the same shall at any time hereafter be; and the said corporation is hereby granted the said island for depots, machine shops, storehouses, and other appurtenances necessary to facilitate the receipt and discharge of merchandise, freight, and passengers: Provided, That such part of said island as may be necessary for the erection of fortifications by the Government may be reserved by the President of the United States within two years after the passage of this act; the said company, when duly organized, to deposit in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a sworn copy of its charter or articles of association or agreement under its corporate seal. None of the rights, benefits, or privileges contemplated by this section of this act shall apply to any railroad or part of railroad situated south of the route mentioned in this section. The said company shall complete and equip not less than fifty miles of its road and telegraph within two years after filing its assent to the conditions of this act, as hereinbefore provided, and not less than fifty miles each year thereafter, until the whole is completed.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commissioners to be appointed by the President of the United States under said act of July 1, 1862, or this act, for the purpose of examining the various sections of railroad and telegraph, to repair to the same and make a personal examination thereof, for which service each of said commissioners shall be paid by the company on whose account he shall be appointed, at the rate of eight dollars a day for the time he shall be engaged in such actual examination, and ten cents a mile for traveling from his residence to the section to be examined. And any such commissioner who shall knowingly make or sign a certificate in this behalf containing a false or fraudulent statement of any matter required to be contained therein, shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall, on conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished with the same penalty now indicted by law in cases of perjury committed by a witness in civil suits in the circuit courts of the United States; and such certificate, and any patent which may issue upon it, shall be null and void as between the United States and such company, and any of its grantees, assignees, or mortgagees having notice of such falsity or fraud; and the land affected thereby shall revert absolutely to the United States. And the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to appoint commissioners for the examination of the sections of railroad in California; and such commissioners shall perform the same duties and be subject to the same penalties as other commissioners, and their certificates shall be of the same force and effect in law.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That to enable said corporations to make convenient connections with other railroads they are hereby authorized to establish and maintain all necessary ferries upon and across the Missouri river, and other rivers which their roads may pass in their course; and authority is hereby given them, respectively, to construct bridges over such rivers for such purpose; and authority is hereby granted to the Pacific Railroad Company of Missouri to construct a bridge over the Mississippi river: Provided, however, That any bridge or bridges to be constructed over the Mississippi river or the Missouri river, under the privileges of this act, may, at the option of the company or companies building the same, be built either as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of draw, or with unbroken and continuous spans; and if such bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation than ninety feet above low-water mark over the channel of said rivers, nor in any case less than forty feet above extreme high water, as understood at the point of location, measuring for such elevation to the bottom chord of the bridge; nor shall the span of such bridge covering the main channel of the river be less than three hundred feet in length, with, also, one of the next adjoining spans of not less than two hundred and twenty feet in length; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river as near as practicable. And if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed with a span over the main channel of the river, as understood at the time of the erection of the bridge, of not less than three hundred feet in length, and such span shall not be less than seventy feet above low-water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge, and one of the next adjoining spans shall not be less than two hundred and twenty feet in length. And there shall also be a pivot draw constructed in every such bridge at an accessible and navigable point, with spans of not less than one hundred feet in length on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw; and such draw shall always be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats whose construction may not at the time admit of their passage under the permanent spans of said bridge, except that said draw shall not be required to be opened when engines or trains are passing over said bridge, or when passenger trains are due; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in the opening of said draw after the passage of such engines or trains: Provided, That every railroad car or train of cars about to pass over any bridge constructed under this act shall, before passing upon it and at a reasonable and convenient distance therefrom, stop and remain stationary until duly signaled or notified that the bridge is in readiness to receive it. And any ferry or bridge established or erected under the provisions of this act shall be lawful structures, and for all the purposes of travel, transportation, or other service contemplated by this act, be recognized as parts of the line of railroad of the company establishing or constructing the same; and the officers and crews of all vessels, boats, or rafts navigating any such river are required to regulate the use of said vessels, boats, or rafts, and of any pipes or chimneys belonging thereto, so as not to interfere with the elevation, construction, or use of any of the ferries or bridges so established or erected.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That, for the purposes herein mentioned, and the more effectually to promote and secure the same, the several companies hereinbefore authorized to construct the aforesaid roads are hereby required to make the tracks of their respective roads of such uniform width as the President of the United States shall prescribe; to establish grades and curves as favorable as the nature of the country traversed will admit of, and not exceeding those of other operative and successful railroads in the United States; to operate and use said roads and telegraph for all purposes of communication, travel, and transportation, so far as the public and the Government are concerned, as one continuous line, and in such operation and use to afford and secure to each other equal advantages and facilities as to rates, time, and transportation, without any discrimination of any kind in favor of the road or business of any or either of said companies, or adverse to the road or business of any or either of the others; to transport all iron and other material required for the construction and equipment of the roads of any other of said companies which cannot be transported over the road of such other company, and for such rates as shall be agreed upon by the companies interested; and in case of disagreement, for such rates as the President of the United States shall deem just and equitable to keep their respective roads and telegraphs in proper repair and condition; to transmit all messages, dispatches, and telegrams over said telegraph line, and transport over their respective roads mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores for the Government whenever required so to do by any Department thereof, giving, when required, preference to any and all such business for the Government over all other business, and to perform the same at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not exceeding the rates paid by private parties for similar business or service. And any two or more of such companies are hereby authorized at any time to unite and consolidate their organizations, as the same may or shall be, upon such terms and conditions, and in such manner as they may agree upon, and as shall not be incompatible with this act or the laws of the State or States in which the roads of such companies may be, and to assume and adopt such corporate name and style as they may agree upon, with a capital stock not to exceed the actual cost of the roads so to be consolidated, and shall file a copy of such consolidation in the Department of the Interior; and thereupon such organization, so formed and consolidated, shall succeed to possess and be entitled to receive from the Government of the United States all and singular the grants, benefits, immunities, guarantees, acts, and things to be done and performed, and be subject to the same terms, conditions, restrictions, and requirements which said companies, respectively, at the time of such consolidation, are or may be entitled or subject to under this act, in place and substitution of said companies so consolidated, respectively. And all other provisions of this act, so far as applicable, relating or in any manner appertaining to the companies so consolidated or either thereof, shall apply and be of force as to such consolidated organization. And in case, upon the completion by such consolidated organization of the roads or either of them, of the companies so consolidated, any other of the road or roads of either of the other companies authorized as aforesaid, (and forming, or intended, or necessary to form a portion of a continuous line from each of the several points on the Missouri river, hereinbefore designated, to the Pacific coast,) being wholly or in part incomplete or unconstructed, such consolidated organization is hereby authorized to continue the construction of its road and telegraph in the general direction and route upon which such incomplete or unconstructed road is hereinbefore authorized to be built, until such continuation of the road of such consolidated organization shall reach the constructed road and telegraph of said other company, and at such point to connect and unite therewith; and for and in aid thereof the said consolidated organization may do and perform, in reference to such portion of road and telegraph as shall so be in continuation of its constructed road and telegraph, and to the construction and equipment thereof, all and singular the several acts and things hereinbefore provided, authorized, or granted to be done by the company hereinbefore authorized to construct and equip the same, and shall be entitled to similar and like grants, benefits, immunities, guarantees, acts, and things to be done and performed by the Government of the United States, by the President of the United States, by the Secretaries of the Treasury and Interior, and by commissioners, in reference to such company and to such portion of the road hereinbefore authorized to be constructed by it, and upon the like and similar terms and conditions, so far as the same are applicable thereto; and all the rights, benefits, and privileges which shall be acquired, possessed, or exercised, pursuant to this section, shall be to that extent an abatement of the rights, benefits and privileges hereinbefore granted to such other company. And in case any company authorized thereto shall not enter into such consolidated organization, such company, upon the completion of its road as hereinbefore provided, shall be entitled to, and is hereby authorized to continue and extend the same, under the circumstances, and in accordance with the provisions of this section, and to have all the benefits thereof as fully and completely as are herein provided touching such consolidated organization. And in case more than one such consolidated organization shall be made, pursuant to this act, the terms and conditions of this act, hereinafter recited as to one, shall apply in like manner, force, and effect to the other: Provided, however, That rights and interests, at any time acquired by one such consolidated organization, shall not be impaired by another thereof.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That the several railroad companies named in this act and the act to which it is an amendment are authorized to enter into an arrangement with the original contractor with the Government under the act entitled "An act to facilitate the communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electric telegraph," approved June 16, 1860, so that the present line of telegraph between the Missouri river and San Francisco may be moved upon or along the line of said Union Pacific railroad and its said branches in Kansas and California, as fast as said line and its said branches are built; and if said arrangement be entered into and the transfer of said telegraph line be made in accordance therewith to the line of said railroad and branches, such transfer shall, for all the purposes of this act, be held and deemed a fulfillment on the part of said railroad companies of the provisions of this act in regard to the construction of said line of telegraph; and in case of disagreement said telegraph companies are hereby authorized to remove their line of telegraph along and upon the line of railroad herein contemplated, without prejudice to the rights of said railroad companies: Provided, That such line of telegraph shall be constructed and maintained as provided by act of Congress authorizing the construction of the said Pacific telegraph, and subject to the restrictions, requirements, and provisions of this act, as to its rates of charges and management, and to such subsequent legislation as Congress shall see fit. And it shall not be lawful for the proprietors of the said line of telegraph to San Francisco to refuse or fail to convey for all persons requiring the transmission of news or messages over said line, to send and forward the same at equal rates charged to any other parties for the transmission of news and messages of like character, on pain of forfeiting to the person injured, for each offense, the sum of $100 to be sued for and recovered in an action of debt in any court of the United States or of any State or Territory of competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That the holders of the bonds of any of the companies hereinafter named, upon which the Government shall guarantee the payment of any interest as hereinafter provided, may use such bonds in payment for any lands herein granted to the companies issuing such bonds, respectively, at the par value thereof, paying or allowing to such company such price for any such lands as shall be agreed upon, not exceeding ten dollars per acre; and the guarantee of the Government for the payment of interest on any such bonds, so used, in payment for lands shall thereupon cease and be extinguished: Provided, however, That such right of purchase with bonds shall only be exercised as to Government sections, and subdivisions thereof, and to an amount by any one holder not exceeding one such section of six hundred and forty acres in any one township.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That any railroad company, not before named in this act, which has been, or may be, incorporated by the United States, or by the States or Territories through which any of the roads named in this act shall be constructed, shall have the right to connect with either of the roads provided for in this act, at such place, and upon such just and equitable terms as may be agreed upon; or, in default of such agreement, the same shall be prescribed by the President of the United States.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That any of said companies failing to perform any of the provisions of this act, so far as the same are to be performed by such company, shall be deemed to have forfeited all right or claim to any of the benefits of this act; and the President of the United States shall have authority in any and each of such cases to enter upon, by a receiver to be appointed by him, the road and telegraph and property of any such company so failing as aforesaid, and control and manage the same for the purposes and business set forth in this act, for such time as the President shall deem expedient, not extending beyond the term of office of the then board of directors, and until the election of such a new board of directors as shall be competent to and as will direct the management of the affairs of the company in conformity with the provisions of this act: Provided, however, That no such failure shall be deemed to have occurred, nor any forfeiture be enforced, nor receiver be appointed, unless and until such company, after notification by the President of the United States, shall omit, decline, or refuse to remedy such failure within such reasonable time as shall be required in such notice.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That each of the companies named in this act shall file its assent to the several provisions contained therein, applicable thereto, under the seal of the said company, in the Department of the Interior, within six months after the approval of this act; and whenever it shall appear that the net earnings of the entire railroad and telegraph, including the amount allowed for services rendered the United States, after deducting all expenditures, including repairs and the furnishing, running, and managing of said road, shall exceed ten per cent. upon its cost, Congress may reduce the rates of fare thereon, if unreasonable in amount, and may fix and establish the same by law; and the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare and the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and by the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other public purposes, Congress may, at any time, having due regard for the rights of the said companies named herein, add to, alter, amend, or repeal any of the provisions of this act necessary to accomplish the said purposes. Whenever the word company is used in this act, it shall be construed to embrace the words "their associates, successors, and assigns," in the same manner as if the words had been properly added thereto.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That the companies herein created, and the roads connected therewith under the provisions of this act, shall each make to the Secretary of the Treasury an annual report, wherein shall be set forth: First. The names of the stockholders and their places of residence, so far as the same can be ascertained. Second. The names and residences of the directors and all other officers of the company. Third. The amount of stock subscribed and the amount thereof actually paid in. Fourth. A description of the lines of road surveyed, of the lines thereof fixed upon for the construction of the road, and the cost of such surveys. Fifth. The amount received from passengers on the road. Sixth. The amount received from freight thereon. Seventh. A statement of the expense of said road and its fixtures. Eighth. A statement of the indebtedness of said companies, setting forth the various kinds thereof. Which report shall be sworn to by the president of the said company, and shall be presented to the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the 1st day of July in each year.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That section ten of the act of which this is an amendment, and the proviso of section seventeen of said act, imposing a forfeiture for the non-completion of said railroads by the 1st of July, 1876, section nineteen of said act, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed, except as to any rights or legal remedies already accrued; which rights and remedies are hereby preserved and continued as if this act had not passed.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator to give way with this bill to-day and let us have an executive session. We have some very important business to transact.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire first to get through with some formal amendments to this substitute which will take but a very short time.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I will make a very brief statement relating to the contents of this substitute which the committee have presented for the original bill.

By the act of 1862, incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the United States agreed with the company to issue United States bonds for the purpose of aiding and assisting that company in the construction of its road. By the terms of the act of 1862 these Government bonds, bearing interest at six per cent., payable semi-annually, were to issue for the benefit of the company at the rate of $16,000 for each mile of road which should be completed eastwardly from the eastern base of the Rocky mountains. That was a direct loan on the part of the Government of the United States to the company to aid it in carrying on this enterprise. For the intermediate places between the mountains, that is between the Rocky mountains and the Sierra Nevada mountains, the Government agreed to loan to the company $32,000 per mile in Government bonds; and to loan, I think, the same amount for that portion of the road which might lie west of the Sierra Nevada mountains in the State of California. There were, however, two mountain districts which were likely to be very expensive to the company in the construction of the road across them—one hundred and fifty miles on the Rocky mountains and one hundred and fifty miles across the Sierra Nevada mountains—and upon each of these districts the Government agreed to loan to the company its bonds, amounting to $48,000 for each mile, on the same terms and bearing the same amount of interest.

The substitute now offered by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad prohibits the issuing of any Government bonds either to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, which is the company chartered by the Government of the United States, or to any other company engaged in the construction of this road; but it provides that the companies themselves, for the purpose of raising money to aid in the construction of the road, may be authorized to issue their corporate bonds to the amount of $24,000 for that portion of the road lying between the one hundredth degree of west longitude and the eastern base of the Rocky mountains. For the mountain districts the company is authorized to issue its bonds amounting to $96,000 for each mile completed, equipped, and finished, and $48,000 of its bonds for each mile finished and equipped in the intermediate space between these two mountain districts. The Government agree in the substitute which I have offered to guaranty to the holder of these bonds the interest falling due thereon for the period of twenty years from and after the date of the bond.

The first year's interest is to be paid by the Government of the United States absolutely and as a gratuity to the company by the very terms of the bill, and after that the United States stipulate to pay the interest annually upon all these bonds that may thus be issued by the company, provided the company itself fails to pay them at the time and place when and where they are to be paid. But the substitute provides that before the company shall issue and put in circulation any of its corporate bonds, it shall make a mortgage, under the direction of the President of the United States and of the Secretary of the Treasury, as a security for the payment of all the corporate bonds which may thus issue, including the interest and including the interest upon the interest that the United States may be obliged to pay.

The substitute provides further that in case the United States shall be obliged to pay and shall pay any portion of the interest upon these bonds falling due during the period of nineteen years, it shall be substituted to all the rights and equities appertaining to the original bondholder or bondholders; that is to say, the company, under its present organization, will be authorized by this substitute to issue its corporate bonds to a certain amount, and, if it pleases, to put them into circulation, to get them discounted in the market. But after it shall have finished, in one case, forty miles of its road, and in another case twenty miles of its road, it, or the holders of its bonds, have a right to bring the bonds to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States accompanied by a certificate of the completion of a section of forty or twenty miles of the road, as the case may be, and then the Secretary of the Treasury is required to indorse upon each one of those bonds thus produced to him, the guarantee of the Government for the payment of the interest for twenty years. The bonds may thus be produced to the Secretary of the Treasury by a bona fide holder or by the agent of the corporation itself at any time. Whenever it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that a certain section of the road has been completed and these bonds shall be produced, it becomes his duty to put upon the back of the bond a guarantee of the Government that the interest shall be paid, as I have previously stated.

Instead, therefore, of the United States becoming the principal debtor in the prosecution of this great enterprise, it becomes merely the guarantor and security for the payment of the interest for twenty years upon the bonds which the company may of itself issue. The Government is not liable for the principal of the bonds, but only for the interest upon the bonds during the period of twenty years. The bond itself is to run thirty years, but the Government makes itself responsible for the payment of the interest upon the bond only for twenty years as a guarantor—not precisely in the technical sense of a guarantor, but in a capacity which very much resembles that of a guarantor.

In the substitute now offered, the Government waives all notice of the non-payment of the interest by the company and waives its claim to a formal demand of payment by the holder of the bond upon the company. It was thought by the company that this ceremony was really of no use either to the bondholder or to the Government of the United States, while at the same time the substitute requires the company to give notice to the Secretary of the Treasury three months beforehand in case the company shall foresee that it will not be able to meet the semi-annual interest upon its bonds as it may fall due. This was a matter of mere convenience, requiring the company in case it shall be prospectively unable to meet this interest to give notice to the Government so that the Government can prepare to meet it beforehand.

I will not further take up the time of the Senate in explaining the provisions of this substitute. The other provisions of the substitute are merely such as are necessary to carry this great and leading provision into full effect.

Mr. MORRILL. What is the amount of our liability?

Mr. HOWARD. The amount of our liability, so far as it can be ascertained, will not, I apprehend, vary essentially from the same liability as would have arisen under the act of 1862. I think it is considerably less.

Mr. MORRILL. I have heard it said that it would be $50,000,000 more.

Mr. HOWARD. No; it will be less. In the course of the discussion I will lay some tables before the Senate, if they will give them their attention. I think the whole liability of the United States will be considerably less under this measure than under the act of 1862. So far as computation can reach it, it is considerably less.

But, sir, I desire to offer some amendments to this amendment, if it is in order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the committee to have reported in the first place a bill with certain amendments to that bill, and then to have reported a substitute to take the place of the bill and amendments.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is agreeable to the Senate the Chair will proceed to the perfection of the substitute in the first instance.

Mr. HOWARD. I supposed that would be the course. In section one, line forty-three, I move to insert the word "be" after the word "may."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section three, line seventy, after the word "land" I move to insert the words "for the purposes of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section three, line seventy-five, I move to insert the words "State or" before the word "Territory."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section seven, line four, after the words "Rocky mountains" I move to insert "which eastern base shall be ascertained and fixed by the President of the United States." This is a mere verbal omission. These words ought to have been inserted in the draft of the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section eight, line forty-two, after the word "bonds" I move to strike out the words "for each mile of railroad." They are merely tautological.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section eight, line fifty-two, I move to strike out the words "said Union Pacific Railroad," and to insert the word "such."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section ten, line fifteen, after the word "bonds" I move to insert the words "so produced to him."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section eleven, line twenty-three, I move to strike out the word "subrogated" and to insert "entitled." I do this in order to strike out a useless technical term which tends to embarrass plain men.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section twelve, line two, I move to insert the word "original" before the word "act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section twelve, line three, I move to strike out the word "condition" and insert the word "consideration."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section twelve, line twenty, I move to strike out the word "condition" and insert "consideration."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section thirteen, line forty-seven, I move to strike out the words "by him," and in line forty-eight, after the word "survey," to insert "thereof."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section sixteen, line forty-three, I move to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That for the distance of fifteen miles of said railroad and telegraph line lying between Stockton and the Alameda valley, and lying on the Contra Costa mountains, the said company may issue its bonds, to be guaranteed as aforesaid, at the rate of forty-eight per mile.

That proviso is in the wrong place, and I move to strike it out here with a view of inserting it in another portion of the substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I now move to insert the same proviso in section seventeen, line thirty-one, after the word "be:"

Provided, That for the distance of fifteen miles of said railroad and telegraph line lying between Stockton and the

Alameda valley, and lying on the Contra Costa mountains, the said company may issue its bonds, to be guaranteed as aforesaid, at the rate of forty-eight per mile.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In section twenty-six, lines one and two, I move to strike out the words "companies herein created" and to insert "said Union Pacific Railroad Company."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to strike out the following clause at the end of section twelve:

And that no dividend exceeding five per cent. on their stock shall be paid until the United States shall have been reimbursed in gold or silver coin, and such services, for all payments of interest under said guarantee and the said interest thereon.

I do not see any use whatever for that clause, but it has found its way in there. I move to strike it out.

Mr. HALE. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator about that. Does he propose to take away all the lien of the Government, and allow them to divide five per cent. among themselves without making provision for paying the Government anything?

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from New Hampshire will cast his eye back to this section he will see that all the net proceeds of the road are appropriated and applied to the payment of the interest until the whole of the interest is paid. It is fully provided for. I do not see why we should undertake to trammel the company as to the disposition of its money after we have provided specifically that it shall all be applied to the payment of this interest. This clause has no effect at all.

Mr. POMEROY. But suppose the dividends more than equal the interest?

Mr. HOWARD. There cannot be any dividend until the interest is all paid.

Mr. POMEROY. Suppose the net earnings more than equal the interest?

Mr. HOWARD. That is not very probable. I do not think we run any great risk in that regard.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. These are all the amendments that I now desire to make; and I am willing, if the Senate so desire, to let the bill stand over till to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to move an executive session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the bill goes over, I desire to move an amendment, that it may be pending. I shall not ask action on it now. I move to strike out, on page 2, the following words, from line thirty-two to line thirty-six of the first section:

And two thousand shares shall be the greatest amount which any one person may hereafter subscribe for or hold at any time, or for which certificates of shares shall in any case be issued or recognized by said company.

I see no reason for limiting the amount of shares which a person may take in this company. I think the difficulty will be to get parties to take the shares; and we need not be afraid that they will take too many. I do not press action on it now, but I move the amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I call the Senator's attention also to the fact that on the 4th page there should be a similar amendment. The Senator from Illinois should also move to strike out, in the sixty-second and sixty-third lines, the words "not however to exceed in amount to any one person the above limitation of two thousand shares."

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the first amendment carries, of course the next will be necessary to make it conform.

Mr. SUMNER. Before my colleague makes the motion which he is about to make, I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan whether he proposes to go on with this bill to-morrow.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I asked the question because if the Senator did not desire to go on with this bill I wished to ask the Senate to take up another bill to have it in order to be proceeded with to-morrow.

Mr. HOWARD. I feel it my duty to press the consideration of the bill now before the Senate reasonably. I am anxious to have it passed by this body. I know that it will undergo a great deal of discussion in the House of Representatives, and probably meet with a great deal of opposition there; and I think the sooner we pass it here the better it will be for the country.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will understand me. I did not intend to interfere with him, but merely wished to know whether he intended to press the bill to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. In the bills incorporating railroad companies in New Hampshire, it has been the general practice to insert a provision that the State at any time may purchase the road by paying the cost and ten per cent. interest on the investment. Would the Senator from Michigan have any objection to a provision of that sort in this bill?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not think the Government would be running any very great hazard, and I should have no objection to it here.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 18, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. Hosmer, of Buffalo, New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DISLOYAL EMPLOYÉ.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th instant, that there was employed in the Treasury Department a person named Garnett, as a clerk in the office of the Register of the Treasury, at a salary of $1,200 a year; that he was not Assistant Register, and was never even thought of in connection with that office; that the Department has no knowledge that he ever held a commission in the rebel army, or that he was a prisoner in the Old Capitol; that his appointment was recommended by Hon. J. C. Underwood, United States district judge for the eastern district of Virginia, and by Hon. Mr. Chandler, of the Norfolk district, in the same State; that some time since, on receiving charges against him, the Secretary, according to the usual practice, referred them to the Register for examination, and on the report of the Register, made on the 4th instant, he was at once notified that his services were no longer required.

POINT OF ORDER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a statement in relation to a decision made yesterday upon a point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and partially to correct the decision. When the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAWES,] immediately after the votes on the contested-election cases yesterday, offered a resolution providing for paying the applicants for seats in this House from the State of Virginia, the Chair, supposing that it was reported from the Committee of Elections, decided that it was in order. The chairman stated, however, in reply, that he offered it himself and upon his own responsibility, and not as a report from his committee; and the Chair then stated, upon a point of order raised by his colleague upon the floor, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that he still held it in order. The Chair then had in his recollection a case which occurred in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, when the present occupant of the chair was a member of the Committee of Elections, when Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, a member of that committee, but not its chairman, immediately after the vote on the Nebraska contested-election case, presented a resolution for paying the contestant. The proceedings which took place upon that occasion, so far as their bearing on the present point is concerned, were as follows, as appearing in the Globe:

"Mr. STEPHENS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House pay out of the contingent fund of this House to Hiram P. Beant, of Nebraska, claiming to have been elected the Delegate from said Territory, his mileage and per diem to this date.

"Mr. SEWARD. I object to the resolution being introduced. I am opposed to the system of paying all these contestants out of the contingent fund.

"The SPEAKER. It is a question appertaining to the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, and the Chair thinks it is in order.

"Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand that the resolution is properly before the House?"

"The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is properly before the House."

That proceeding was in the recollection of the Chair yesterday, but upon examining other election cases since the adjournment he found the current of decisions decidedly the other way. This was a decision made by Mr. Banks, then Speaker of the House, but which it appears he afterwards reconsidered himself. The decisions have been that the Committee of Elections have the right to report resolutions paying contestants whenever the committee is properly called. The point of order has been repeatedly made that as the matter of paying contestants has not specially been referred to them by the House they had not the right to report on it, but the Speakers have uniformly held that as such resolutions grew out of the cases referred to them by the House they had the right to report a resolution for paying contestants. But as the Chair made the decision yesterday upon this single precedent and one other of a similar character, while the bulk of the decisions have been different, he is of opinion that to the extent he has now stated he was wrong, and that the gentleman from Indiana was correct in his point of order that it is not a question of privilege. The committee can report it at any time when called upon, but they have not the right to report it as a question of privilege.

The Chair would state, however, that as the resolution was subsequently, by unanimous consent, referred to the committee, with a right to report at any time, the decision has not, in any degree, materially affected the question, as the committee could have reported it irrespective of the decision on any private bill day, or whenever on any other day they were called in their turn for reports.

PORTS OF DELIVERY.

On motion of Mr. McBRIDE, an act (S. No. 242) for establishing Portland, in the State of Oregon, and Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, ports of delivery, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MARY A. BAKER.

On motion of Mr. McBRIDE, an act (S. No. 122) for the relief of Mary A. Baker, widow of Brigadier General Edward A. Baker, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill granting public lands to aid in the construction of a branch of the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph line through the mineral lands of Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona.

Mr. SPALDING objected.

VETERAN VOLUNTEER ENGINEERS.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, a bill (H. R. No. 251) to organize a regiment of veteran volunteer engineers, returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken up for consideration.

Senate amendment:

Strike out section three, as follows:

And he it further enacted, That all persons reenlisting under the provisions of this act shall receive the bounties now paid to veteran volunteers, provided they shall enlist within one month after the passage of this act, and they shall be accredited to the subdivisions of States in which they were originally enlisted.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is an amendment of no particular consequence, and the Committee on Military Affairs are willing that it shall be adopted by the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) relating to Green Clay Goodloe; and joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) providing for the election of a member of Congress for the State of Illinois by the State at large.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had appointed Mr. COWAN a member of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. No. 40) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, in the place of Mr. MORGAN.

PUNISHMENT OF GUERRILLAS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back a bill from the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a measure of very grave importance to the Army at this time, and will not, I think, occasion debate. It is for the punishment of guerrillas in the lines of the Army by a single provision that commanders in the field shall have final jurisdiction of these cases as they now have in courts-martial, and not be compelled to send such cases to Washington, thus causing serious delay. The bill is asked for by the War Department, and is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 429) was read for information. It is to provide for the more speedy punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes. It enacts that the provisions of the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces," approved March 3, 1863, shall apply as well to the sentences of military commissions as to those of courts-martial; and authorizes the commanding general in the field, or the commander of the department, as the case may be, to carry into execution all sentences against guerrillas for robbery, arson, burglary, rape, assault with intent to commit rape, violations of the laws and customs of war, &c.

The second section enacts that every officer authorized to order a general court-martial shall have power to pardon or mitigate any punishment ordered by such court, including that of confinement in the penitentiary, except the sentence of death, or of cashiering or dismissing an officer, which sentences it shall be competent, during the continuance of the present rebellion, for the general commanding the army in the field, or the department commander, as the case may be, to remit or mitigate; and it repeals the fifth section of the act approved July 17, 1862, chapter two hundred and one, so far as it relates to sentences of imprisonment in the penitentiary.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the bill being reported back at this time?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word. Our soldiers in the front are being daily shot down by guerrillas and our wounded massacred, and I ask that our generals in the field may be clothed with the requisite power to protect them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Ohio submitting some remarks?

Mr. ROSS. I object.

PROMOTIONS FROM THE RANKS.

Mr. LAW, by unanimous consent, offered a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency and propriety of providing by law for the promotion of such non-commissioned officers and privates as may be distinguished for their good conduct and bravery in the field to appointments as officers in the line; and to report by bill or otherwise.

LOCATION OF LANDS BY FLOATS.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 205) authorizing the issue of patents for locations made with certificates granted under authority of the act of Congress approved March 17, 1862, allowing floats in satisfaction of lands sold by the United States within the limits of the Las Ormeas and La Nana grants in Louisiana.

The bill was read.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask to have a letter read from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The letter was read, as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, April 28, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to return your letter to you of 16th January last, recommending the issue of patents for tracts selected in satisfaction of La Nana and Las Ormeas claims, pursuant to the act of Congress, approved 17th March, 1862, and in reference to your oral request of this morning respectfully submit that the state of the case is briefly this:

The law of Congress ordered the floats; they have been issued; a number of them have been located on specific tracts, and doubtless the residue will soon be returned likewise located on tracts of public lands. Where the location is found regular and correct, in all particulars, the tracts so located become the private property of the assignee of the float, as if it were so designated as his property in an act of Congress. The only reason for suggesting the issue of patents in such cases is to give the lawful owner, in convenient and condensed form of patent, the usual evidence of his title, otherwise he would have to resort to his certificate of location and other kindred papers, as such evidence of his right. The verified copies of these by the Department cost more than a patent, and is not by any means so satisfactory, the former being the instrument generally ordered by law as the evidence of a party's title from the United States.

These are the considerations which have induced the recommendation of this office that legislation be had to authorize patents, as without express authority of law we have no power to issue them.

With great respect,

J. M. EDMUNDS, Commissioner.

Hon. GEORGE W. JULIAN, Chairman Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VIRGINIA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. WILSON asked unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary an act (S. No. 256) to change and define the boundaries of the eastern and western judicial districts of Virginia, and to alter the names of said districts, and for other purposes.

The bill was read for information. It enacts that the jurisdiction of the western district of Virginia shall be hereafter coextensive with and confined to the limits of the State of West Virginia; and shall be called the district of West Virginia; and that the jurisdiction of the eastern district shall hereafter be coextensive with the limits and include the whole of the State of Virginia, and shall be called the district of Virginia.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN objected.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. GANSON. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President to give the requisite notice for terminating the treaty made with Great Britain on behalf of the British provinces in North America, and to appoint commissioners to negotiate a new treaty with the British Government, based upon the true principles of reciprocity, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, among the many subjects of importance requiring our attention, none except those immediately relating to the deplorable events transpiring in our own country so justly occupy our time as our relations to the young and rising nations inhabiting the territory contiguous to our own on the north. If Mexico, our neighbor on the south, ready, perhaps, to form an alliance with the insurgent States, is to be ruled by a Power hostile to us and our institutions, does it not form a proper portion of our public policy to cultivate the most friendly relations with the British colonies? Mexico has, it is true, been called a republic. She has striven after the realization of popular government, but has been too weak to attain it. The result has been anarchy, followed by her falling an easy prey to European invaders, insignificant in number compared with her own forces. In the British provinces the principle of government by the people through their representatives is more fully acknowledged than in any country of magnitude except our own. Already they contain a population more numerous than all the free inhabitants of the United States in 1790, several years after the revolutionary war had terminated in peace. Their territory is capable of maintaining in affluence a population much larger than ours now is. Our commerce with the single province of Canada alone has, for the last five years, been larger than with any other country excepting England, France, and Cuba. Can there be any doubt that it is more reasonable to attempt by negotiation the removal of any objectionable features which may have arisen in connection with the existing treaty, than to disturb the industry and investments of the large portion of our citizens now directly or indirectly engaged in this trade?

Besides the limited provisions as to reciprocal trade and navigation, the treaty settled many difficulties which had long occupied the attention of our statesmen. The free use of the St. John river was considered important to the eastern lumber trade. But the most pressing and urgent motive undoubtedly arose from the value of the fisheries near the maritime provinces, and the imminent probability of hostilities with Great Britain unless some method could be devised by which the fishermen of the United States might pursue their calling on those coasts. A large number of our fellow-citizens are engaged in these fisheries. Their lifetime is one of difficulty and peril. From the energy and character formed by a continual struggle with the rough elements in the northern seas springs the multitude of those who, by their unconquerable perseverance and hardihood, enrich us by promoting our foreign commerce, and carry our nation's flag into the ports of every sea. A practical acquiescence had to some extent been given to our limited participation in the fisheries. The provincial coast abounds in deep bays and inlets, very extensive, and forming an important portion of the fishing grounds. It was claimed by Great Britain that as she had jurisdiction within three miles of the coast, the old-time limit of cannon-shot, the distance should be measured, not along the shore, but from certain specified and prominent headlands. This was for a long time an essential point in the controversy.

By the convention of 1818 between Great Britain and the United States in relation to the fisheries, we renounced forever any liberty theretofore enjoyed or claimed by American citizens to take, dry, or cure fish on or within three marine miles from any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of British North America, but stipulated that they should have forever in common with the subjects of Great Britain the liberty to take fish of every kind on certain parts of the coast of Newfoundland, around the Magdalen islands, and on the coast of Labrador.

Complaints having been made by the several colonies that the British Government did not enforce the provision of the convention, but permitted Americans to encroach upon the fishing grounds thus renounced, a case was prepared in 1841 by the Legislature of Nova Scotia, to be submitted to the imperial Crown officers; and the Advocate General and Attorney General of England gave it as their deliberate opinion that "by the terms of the convention, American citizens are excluded from any right of fishing within three miles from the coast of British America, and that the prescribed distance of three miles is to be measured from the headlands or extreme points of land, next the sea, of the coast, or of the entrance of bays or inlets of the coast, and consequently that no right exists on the part of American citizens to enter the bays of Nova Scotia, there to take fish, although the fishing being within the bay may be at a greater distance than three miles from the shore of the bay; as we are of opinion that the term 'headland' is used in the treaty to express that part of the land we have before mentioned, including the interiors of the bays and the inlets of the coast."

The colonial authorities maintained this view of the case, and it was confirmed by Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, who, after quoting the first article of the convention, used the following terms:

"It would appear that by a strict and rigid construction of this article fishing vessels of the United States are precluded from entering into the bays or harbors of the British provinces, except for the purposes of shelter, repairing damages, and obtaining wood and water. A bay, as is usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea, entering from the ocean between capes or headlands; and the term is applied equally to small and large tracts of water thus situated. It is common to speak of Hudson's bay, or the bay of Biscay, although they are very large tracts of water.

"The British authorities insist that England has a right to draw a line from headland to headland, and to capture all American fishermen who may follow their pursuits inside of that line. It was undoubtedly an oversight in the convention of 1818 to make so large a concession to England, since the United States had usually considered that those vast inlets or recesses of the ocean ought to be open to American fishermen, as freely as the sea itself, to within three marine miles of the shore."

It would be difficult to devise a system more likely to embroil the citizens and subjects of the respective countries. From the nature of the occupation itself, and the natural character of those who are engaged in it, frequent infringements of such rules would arise. The precise distance of three miles can never be readily ascertained. Through the interests of men and the ardor of the chase, very different estimates would be made. A settlement of the question in such a way as to give peace and security to the people on both sides was exceedingly desirable. The British authorities, at the instigation of the colonies, insisted upon the strict construction of the convention, which had long been inoperative or partially enforced. Applications for the navigation of the St. Lawrence, previously granted by courtesy, were withheld. A large number of armed vessels was sent by Great Britain to the colonial stations. An excited state of public feeling prevailed. Mr. Webster gave official information that an American fishing vessel had already been taken by the British naval force on the provincial coast. Its crew were carried as prisoners into a British port. An expedition from other American vessels had hastily been armed and organized, and had forcibly retaken the captured vessel. It was deemed prudent by the statesmen of each nation to arrest the progress of events which might, almost at any time, have precipitated the two countries into war, and, if possible, to prevent their recurrence in the future. There was, as the present Secretary of State then said, "only one way that Congress could act, and that was by reciprocal legislation with the British Parliament or the British colonies of some sort." By the treaty the impending dangers were wisely and honorably averted. The fish cured by the colonists was admitted free of duty into our markets, and we acquired for our fishermen, "in addition to the liberty secured to them by the above-mentioned convention of October 20, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies therein defined, the liberty in common with the subjects of her Britannic Majesty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the sea-coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the coasts and shores of those colonies and the islands thereof, and also upon the Magdalen islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with British fishermen, in the peaceable use of any part of the said coast in their occupancy for the same purpose."

Bills of reciprocity had from time to time been previously reported to the House, but none were adopted. After the repeal of preferential duties favoring colonial produce in the home markets of Great Britain, measures for its free admission into the United States were more strenuously urged on behalf of the colonies. The name and intention of reciprocity, and the hope of approach to a system which could not fail to be mutually beneficial, were hailed with delight by many of the best and wisest of the nation. The plan was earnestly advocated on behalf of those great principles which, overlooking sectional boundaries, seek to allow free and practical scope to the natural alliance of material interests with the most noble and benevolent designs of public or international policy.

The British and colonial authorities refused to negotiate on the subject of the fisheries or the navigation of the St. Lawrence apart from the subject of our commercial relations with the colonies, and they were all included in the treaty of 1854.

Our commercial relations with Canada and the other British possessions in North America have been viewed from so many local points; the trade of one city or district has so often been considered as fairly illustrating the character of the whole commerce between us and our neighbors on the north; statistics have frequently been so partially examined with a desire to vindicate some foregoing conclusion rather than to discover and deduce the truth; isolated facts have been reiterated without due regard to others of no less importance—that few enter upon consideration of this question without having formed unjust or acrimonious opinions in relation to it. I do not believe that calm argument, and candid, patient investigation are inconsistent with those just conclusions on all international subjects which are essential to the greatest prosperity of the public; or that it is more patriotic for us who have been sent here to assist in forming laws for the government of this people, to be rigorous and special advocates of some preconceived opinions or local interest than to be unbiased judges desirous of promoting the interests of the nation at large. I would be influenced by no hasty opinion, still less by any inveterate prejudice; considering details, but only considering them in connection with the broader views relating to the aggregate, by no means singling out especially for attack such a condition of international trade as may be presented at some one minor point of entry, but including as far as practicable the whole commerce of the United States with the countries whose territory extends far beyond our own on the northeast shore, and follows inland the projection of Maine, the great lakes of the interior, the wilds of our extreme northwestern Territories and the Rocky mountains; and is as near to the gold-bearing States on the Pacific as to New England and the Atlantic, presenting a frontier continuous with our own for at least four or five thousand miles, from Maine to Oregon.

A widespread impression as to the operation of the treaty has been created by imperfect or mistaken representations. The injury wrought by them is not limited within these walls. The people look to us, if not for guidance, at least for the results of careful thought and deliberate investigation.

It is essentially the nature of our trade with the provinces that our exports from certain western ports should be very large and their imports comparatively insignificant, while the produce from these regions and Canada is poured into our eastern places of entry, whence scarcely any exportation of the same articles takes place. Hence, on one side, the amounts of our sales, which are supposed to be beneficial, are regarded too exclusively, and on the other our purchases are chiefly considered, and these are supposed to be injurious to our interests, in accordance with a popular but erroneous theory applying to great international questions between ourselves and the foreigner such principles as are evidently false in individual transactions between man and man. We must consider the interests of the whole country, studying the facts presented by the whole case. We shall then, I think, be led to the conclusion expressed by the concurrent resolution of the State of New York, that "free commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American provinces and possessions, developing the natural, geographical, and other advantages of each for the good of all, is conducive to the present interest of each, and is the only proper basis of our intercourse for all time to come." Let us approach the subject of our relations to the people of these countries with a desire to comprehend it accurately and fully as it is, and a conviction that errors made in the spirit of liberality and friendship are less likely to be injurious than the perverse misunderstandings and recriminations which, with their natural results of hatred, war, devastation, and bloodshed, have hitherto contributed the largest portion to human history.

There is, I think, a general belief that the balance of trade, as it is called, is against us in our intercourse with these colonies, but the statistics recently furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury show that during the period which has elapsed since the treaty went into effect, and computing up to as late a date as our authentic records will permit, our exports to the provinces have been $171,628,779, while our imports have been only $144,183,096, showing that we have sold to them more by $26,445,683 than we have bought from them.

It appears on the same authority that while the amount of our exports to Canada alone, since 1855, has been $134,614,376, we have imported thence articles to the value of $133,147,600, leaving a balance in our favor of $1,466,776. The exports of 1863 include $3,502,180 of gold coin.

If there were no balance on the other side, this fact would be unimportant. The articles brought to the United States from Canada are never articles of luxury, but of the plainest and most absolute utility, for the most part necessary to the maintenance of human life. Hence they are more valuable than the precious metals, and usually may be readily exchanged in the markets of the world either for specie or any other commodity. The isolated fact of this exportation, due to the peculiar condition of our currency, was eagerly seized and used to make an unfavorable impression upon the public mind. As the statistics of the Canadian government credit us with some such amount as I have named, it was inferred at once that our exports to that province alone are annually $10,000,000 in gold or its equivalent. It needed only a little breath, a few words, ready self-deception, bold assertion, with sufficient confidence in the credulity of the public, to expand a statement itself imperfect and erroneous into a bubble of these vast proportions. Upon this airy foundation were erected batteries of invective against the treaty, as if by some means we had been robbed of our just rights by the Canadians; and a vivid picture was drawn of the canals which they had widened and the railroads they had constructed through their forests, with the unjust proceeds of the robbery. In view of our temporary need of many articles in the present national crisis—for instance, to supply our cavalry with horses and the grain most suitable for their maintenance—I should not deem it inconsistent with sound political economy to purchase them with the metal so abundantly supplied by our inexhaustible mines. Nearly the whole trade between the two countries is carried on by means of gold and silver or their equivalent in bills of exchange, or paper money redeemable in specie. For these reasons the exportation of $3,500,000 in specie is not much to be regretted, but the persistent habit of regarding one side only is deeply to be deplored. It led to oversight of the fact that during the year in question we imported through Champlain alone nearly five million dollars in coin of the precious metals.

The balance of trade represents in the main the amount of gold and silver or their equivalents sent from one country to another; and between us and the provinces, since the treaty went into operation, that balance has been more than twenty-six million dollars. Under the influence of an animus unfavorable to fair discussion the error loomed up into gigantic proportions, and it was stated and sent forth to the nation that no other country presents so unfavorable a balance-sheet with us. This method of reasoning is little adapted to promote the interests of our people, or to increase their political intelligence, and more than likely to diminish the respect and good-will entertained toward us by the people of other countries.

I may well be excused from further reference to the errors with which the subject has been invested. It is better to examine the results and character of the trade itself, considering how far reciprocity and mutual benefit do or do not exist in our relations with the provinces, than to follow to their end the delusive arguments of those who are opposed to the principle itself.

I have the satisfaction of knowing that this is no party question, and that many gentlemen on the other side of the House unite with me in efforts to establish or extend such a liberal policy toward the provinces as shall mutually benefit both of us, knitting us together by the bonds which are of all the most powerful, those of mutual interest, well judged, in necessary conformity to higher principles. I am less desirous of a union of the Governments than for a union of the people. I do not wish to admit into our family of States any who are not imbued with the spirit of our institutions and do not appreciate as we do the benefits resulting from them, or the principles on which they are established. Prudent men of business are not accustomed in buying and selling to limit their transactions to those who hold the same political or religious opinions as themselves. There is no need for the habitant of Lower Canada to quarrel with the staple article of his food because it is made from wheat grown in Iowa, Wisconsin, or Illinois, or for the workman in the factories of New England to ask for conscience' sake, or for the sake of his country, whether the white loaf or biscuit ornamenting his table is the product of the golden grain which once waved on the fields of Upper Canada.

The facts carefully collected by the provincial governments fully concur with our own in proving that an immense amount of benefits has accrued to the people of both countries by the increase of their respective freedom through the yet limited removal of artificial obstacles to their intercourse. Upon the plainest principles of commerce, the individual transactions constituting the vast aggregate of this trade since 1855, and amounting to more than fifty million dollars in 1863 alone, must year after year have been sufficiently profitable to remunerate those who produced the substantial materials of the exchanges and those who were engaged in the traffic, who, in their turn, could not have continued their business if they had not found in the people at large customers or consumers who were benefited by the purchases they made.

The treaty was dated June 5, 1854, and its salutary effects were partially experienced during that year. Our exports to the provinces during the seven preceding years have been multiplied nearly three-fold in the seven years which have elapsed since the treaty, having been $69,686,107 in the former, and $171,628,779 in the latter period; while our imports from the same regions have increased more than four-fold—having been $34,815,885 in the former period, against $145,183,096 in the seven years since the treaty went fully into effect.

Taking a general view of the subject commercially considered, showing the results in the aggregate without entering into special and partial details, it does not appear that the system as a whole is one of mere favor to our northern neighbors or of injury to ourselves.

It is to be expected that of the raw or unmanufactured products of the field, the forest, and the sea, computed altogether, the provinces will sell more to us than we can sell to them. This naturally arises from the maritime position of the eastern provinces, and because the provinces stand in much the same relation to the United States as that occupied by the new western States to the older settlements in the East. We receive from them the products free under the treaty to a greater extent than similar articles are exported to them in return, but may reasonably expect to make up the deficiencies by selling more manufactures and commodities of tropical, Asiatic, or other foreign origin, either the products of our own labor or brought from over the seas, chiefly in American vessels, and purchased to a considerable extent with the manufactures or productions of this country; thus employing and enriching our manufacturers, merchants, and commercial marine. We find, in accordance with this view, that from these sources we have exported to the provinces an amount which added to that of the raw material sold by us to them is sufficient to make up the balance of $26,445,683, during the period in consideration, more than we have bought from them—a sum which has been paid in specie or its equivalent.

The value of the foreign merchandise (exclusive of articles passed through the United States in bond) exported by us to the provinces during the seven years immediately following the ratification of the treaty, was $31,366,236—purchased chiefly with productions of the United States, and which yielded employment to the farmer and manufacturer, shipper and sailor, as well as profit to the merchant. The amount of our exports of manufactures and other articles of United States origin, not included in the treaty, is officially stated to have been $47,269,139 during the first six years after it went into effect. (See Ex. Doc. No. 149, Thirty-Seventh Congress, second session, pages 14 and 20.)

When investigating this question it is necessary to remember the peculiar relations of the provinces to each other and to the mother country. Although owing in common a political allegiance to one sovereign, each of the colonies is in fact an empire within an empire, having a legislature of its own. Each of them has a separate tariff, and charges the same duties upon the products of the others, and of Great Britain, as upon those of foreign countries. Their union is political, but not commercial; and the treaty received the sanction, not only of the British Government, but of the colonial legislatures of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland. So far as I have been informed, the results of the treaty with those colonies, which, for the sake of distinction, may be termed the "Maritime Provinces," have been satisfactory, although as to them it should be regarded as neither complete nor final in itself, but as only one link in a chain of events, permitting the people of both countries to perceive more clearly the benefits of mutual intercourse, and to start with increased probabilities of success toward a system of unfettered, absolute, and complete reciprocity, so that each may enjoy fully the natural advantages of friendly neighborhood to the people, territory, and possessions of the other.

Of these provinces Canada is much the most important. In 1860 the inhabitants of them all numbered 3,253,000. Of these, more than 2,500,000 constituted the population of Canada, and less than 700,000 that of the others. This province, projecting from the northern extremity of Maine southerly to Detroit, and thence northerly as far as any considerable settlements are to be found near our frontier, occupies a position whence the best route for passengers and freight to the ocean, by that common highway to other parts of the world, for the whole year is through the territory of the United States. For nearly half the year, when, owing to a rigorous climate, the river St. Lawrence is impassable, the only practicable means of intercourse for Canada with other nations are through this country. Different routes of communication may be opened through the maritime provinces, but none of them can permanently be so beneficial as the lines of travel leading to the great natural centers of the commerce and shipping of this continent, the northern American cities on the Atlantic. Nor are those facilities unimportant to the United States which would create a free right of way, unquestioned and unincumbered by forms, across the large peninsula of Upper Canada, separating several of the northwestern and grain-producing States, together with a vast area of fertile territory yet unoccupied, from the commercial and manufacturing regions in the east. Canada also extends up the St. Lawrence on both sides for several hundred miles from the ocean. Hence mutual rights of transit are exceedingly advantageous to both countries, and our commercial relations with this province are worthy of special consideration.

General dissatisfaction with the treaty exists along the whole of our northern frontier near Canada, and the moral and political effects which it was hoped would result from it have been destroyed, the effect of the Canadian tariffs enacted since 1855 having been to decrease very materially the amount of manufactures and goods of foreign origin sold by the people of this country to those of the provinces. This alone constitutes a sufficient reason for a revision of our mutual commercial relations, so that our manufacturers may not only receive from the regions on the north of us a considerable portion of their necessary supplies of timber, breadstuffs, and animal food, but may also enjoy a less restricted and if practicable an entirely free market for the products of their labor.

During the last five years the manufactures of the United States exported to Canada have in the aggregate decreased from $4,185,516 in 1858–59 to $1,510,802 in 1862–63; and although the fluctuations in our own currency and the scarcity of labor arising from the war have tended to produce this result, there can be no doubt that the chief cause of this important change is to be found in the increased tariffs of Canada, by which the duties on many articles such as are manufactured in the United States have been gradually increased since the time when the treaty was made, when those chiefly levied on such imports into Canada were twelve and a half per cent., but have since been changed, and are now at rates varying from ten to twenty, twenty-five, and thirty per cent. In some instances, such as cigars and spirituous liquors, a higher rate is levied.

The effect of these duties is to permit the importation of British and French manufactures of the finer qualities into Canada as heretofore, but to stimulate the home production of goods of the coarser and more substantial qualities, such as those of the United States chiefly are. Canada cannot, even under a high tariff, compete with the nations of the Old World in the most costly and delicate manufactures, but with the same amount of protection can and does, to a considerable extent, exclude those of the United States—a nation less advanced in this branch of industrial production. There is scarcely any manufacture of this country which has not or will not be transplanted to Canada, and stimulated under the present protective duties of twenty per cent. The only exceptions are those requiring a more extensive market than the comparatively narrow territory and scanty population of the province can afford. Indeed, it has been deliberately calculated by some Canadian statesmen that they will persevere in a protective system against the manufacturers of the United States until the time arrives when they shall be capable, not only of supplying their own market, but will prefer free access to this country for the sale of their goods to a continuation of the protective duty in Canada. The result of a free interchange would no doubt be to encourage in both parts of the continent those manufactures for which each is especially adapted, thus benefiting the people of the two countries by supplying their necessities with less useless expenditure of labor.

It is just to add that the tariff of duties levied by Canada during the period in question has been much lower than the duties charged by us upon her manufactures, and that while our exports of these articles amount to many millions it is very doubtful if the actual manufactures of Canada bought by us reach in the aggregate to more than a few hundred thousand dollars throughout the whole of the last five years, during which the diminution has arisen, although in that time the Canadians alone bought from us manufactures to the value of $15,343,004. (See page 15 Ex. Doc., No. 32, Thirty-Eighth Congress, first session.)

The whole amount of our exports from Canada, subject to duty, for the eight years which have elapsed since the treaty is only $3,595,350, including not only Canadian manufactures but also goods from all other parts of the world. Of these, one class alone, iron and its manufactures, amounted in value to about $1,500,000, not produced in Canada; a fact which, with others of a similar character, gives good ground for believing that if the articles really and exclusively made in the province were selected it would be seen they are no more than those minute matters which are scarcely cognizable in legislation or national statistics.

Adding $33,071,475, the value of foreign merchandise exported by us to Canada during the same eight years, to the domestic manufactures also thus sold, the aggregate value of these classes of our exports to Canada cannot be less than $60,514,479—against $3,595,350, the amount in like manner bought by us from that province.

In addition to the existing and increased impediments to the importation of our manufactures into Canada, one of the obstacles to a fair reciprocity consists in the method enacted by Canadian tariffs, since the treaty, of levying duties on articles according to their value at the place where last purchased, not according to their value in Canada, or by specific duties; thus practically creating a discrimination against the merchants and carriers of the United States. The intention was explicitly avowed, and the results are already known by our experience.

Under the operation of natural laws the trade of Canada in many important articles will flow to and through the Atlantic cities, such as New York and Boston. Under the present system of Canadian legislation our exports of foreign goods to Canada have decreased from $5,501,125 in 1859 to $1,500,397 in 1862, and $1,463,113 in 1863. They attained a yet higher value previous to 1859, when they amounted to $8,769,580; but for the purposes of fair comparison I avoid the years of great expenditure and undue speculation. In 1863 this portion of our trade was only one half of the average it reached in each of the five years preceding the treaty; was less by twenty-five per cent. than in 1849, and since which time our total exports of all kinds to Canada have increased five-fold, or from $4,234,724 to $19,898,718.

That the deficiency in our exports of foreign goods to Canada has not arisen from decreased consumption, but from legislative enactments by duties practically discriminating against the Atlantic cities, is made yet more evident by the official records of the province, whence it appears that the value of merchandise imported into Canada, and passed through the United States under bond, was, in 1860, $3,041,877; in 1861, $5,688,952; and in 1862, $5,508,427. A circumstance which has justly created much dissatisfaction in the provinces (see Consolidated Statutes of Canada, chapter 17, section 24) is that the Governor of Canada, by a departmental order, might discriminate in favor of particular routes through the United States, a singular violation of the comity or hospitality of the United States in extending unusual facilities not required by any treaty for the transfer of goods on the Grand Trunk railroad, via Portland, into Canada.

The chief articles of commerce between the two countries are grain and flour. Of wheat and flour we have exported to Canada between the years 1856 and 1863, inclusive of both years, a quantity amounting in value to $30,643,772, and imported to the value of $49,940,127; the imports exceeding the exports by $19,296,355. Of wheat alone from this province our imports have been 20,956,322 bushels, and our exports to it 22,993,763 bushels. Of oats and other grain our imports have been $15,230,364 in value, making an aggregate of $65,170,491. The value of the same products from the other provinces was $1,990,787, while our exports were $29,422,918, so that upon the whole we have sold the people of the provinces more of cereals and their products by $360,474 than we have bought from them, our exports having been $67,521,752, and our imports $67,161,278. Of flour and breadstuffs alone, from 1856 to 1861, our exports to all the provinces exceeded our imports from them by $6,184,224. From the nature and geographical position of our territory we have been, and under a free system shall continue to be, the forwarders and merchants between the people of the different provinces.

The question on both sides as regards wheat and flour is not one of revenue or consumption, but rather of commerce and transportation. If our whole crop of breadstuffs were sold to Canada, and sent as it would be, unless sold to the United States, to a foreign market via the St. Lawrence, the market value of the Canadian crop would neither be enhanced nor diminished; nor would our farmers be injured if the Canadian surplus is sent through the Erie canal or over our railroads and the Hudson river, except that in both cases the local demands would be increased by the amount required for the use of that part of the population which would be employed in transacting the increased business.

Many beneficial results are produced in the course of these exchanges. A large amount of Canadian wheat is mixed and ground with western wheat by our millers, with results profitable to themselves and their customers. New England consumes much of the best wheat and flour of Canada West; and I am not one of those who are desirous of protecting the manufactures of New England by taxing their bread as well as their fuel. According to the census of 1861 Canada East contains 1,111,566 inhabitants, producing only 2,563,114 and consuming, it is estimated, nearly 3,000,000 bushels of wheat. From habit and other causes these people prefer the spring wheat of Wisconsin and Illinois. The corn produced in great abundance and at small cost in the rich warm valleys of the Wabash and Illinois is consumed to a considerable extent in the provinces, especially in the manufacture of alcohol, and we in our turn import and use a large quantity of barley and oats—grains grown in great perfection by the people of the provinces.

The products of the forest are the next in value among our importations from the provinces, having amounted during the last eight years to $23,537,203, of which $19,894,930 were from Canada, and $3,642,273 from the other provinces—an annual average of $2,942,150, while our sales of the same class to them have been comparatively small. No inconsiderable share of this timber has replaced old rail fences on our farms, or inclosed new land, or built the house of the pioneer on the prairies. With the progress of our settlements our own supply of this necessary article has been seriously diminished, and its sources have gradually become more remote and inaccessible. Unlike the crops of the farmer, which may be produced year after year, a second crop of pine timber is never expected from the same land. Protection has some force in favor of those manufactures which we are led to believe will ultimately be sold cheaper if we grant a temporary monopoly to their producers, but the more the manufacture of lumber is increased the further we shall have to go for it, and the higher will be the price of an article of which there is necessarily only a limited supply. In the freedom and expansion of this trade the Government relinquished a small amount of revenue, but the traffic of our northern lakes and canals was greatly increased, employing profitably a large number of our citizens. The carrier and consumer, together with the manufacturers of New York and New England, partake of these benefits. Timber, a necessary article of consumption in building, and especially the material used for this purpose by people of moderate means, is also essential in the construction of ships—an important branch of national industry and element of greatness, compelled to face the eager competition of the whole world—and the supply of timber suitable for ship-building has been so much reduced in the United States that memorials have been presented to this House asking that its exportation may be prohibited. We sell timber extensively to the British colonies and other countries, so that the exports the last two years have been nearly seven millions. Our importation from the provinces of the raw materials used to a considerable extent in these manufactures, is annually $2,942,150, and our exports of the manufactures themselves in the last two years have been more than ten millions.

The class of importations next in value is that of animals and their products. These during the last eight years have amounted to $11,813,332 from Canada alone. With the other provinces this trade is of nominal value. We export large quantities of pork, beef, lard, butter, &c., to Canada, making in all an aggregate of exports in this class of $12,057,510—rather more than our imports—the nature of the trade being that we chiefly import animals themselves and sell their products.

The remaining miscellaneous articles are for the most part of no large amount separately, but consist of such materials as should be supplied to our people and manufacturers at as low a price as possible. Among the most important of those not yet named is coal, an essential element of household life and comfort, and the chief producer of the great labor-saving power of steam. The exports from Ohio and Pennsylvania to Upper Canada are nearly of the same value as our importations from the lower provinces. In Canada West the coal of these States has superseded that brought from Liverpool and the lower provinces; and, at Montreal, the anthracite of the easterly portions of Pennsylvania also competes with the coal brought from Liverpool and Nova Scotia. These minerals are not found in the geological formations of Upper Canada, and as the forests disappear, and wood becomes too valuable to be used as fuel, that part of the provinces will ultimately depend exclusively upon the United States for the most economical supply of this necessary article. Anthracite coal, although found abundantly on the eastern slope of the Alleghenies, is found nowhere in the colonies, and will always, in the natural course of events, be imported by them; while as many purposes of fuel in the eastern States, economy dictates the use of the coal of Nova Scotia. Bituminous coal, of the kind most commonly used in the manufacture of gas, is not found in our territory east of the Alleghany mountains, within an available distance of our chief Atlantic cities. It would be needless to say that a trade of this kind is mutually beneficial. Under a system of free trade in coal, the people of each country are supplied more cheaply than they otherwise could be with necessary light and fuel; and both save, throughout large regions, the expense and labor of carrying a heavy and bulky article for several hundred miles.

All the various commodities received free of duty by each country from the other under the provisions of the treaty are the simplest and plainest necessities for the support of human life. I am opposed to any permanent legislation that would prevent the free importation of them; to every system that under any specious name, hiding an error or pretense, signifies dearer food and increased taxation on the raw materials used in the manufactures; to any system, whether called protective or not, which means diminished commerce by expelling colonial produce from our canals and railroads to increase the employment of British shipping through British seaports at the expense of our own.

As regards the objection sometimes urged, that if by reciprocal legislation we admit certain raw materials free of duty from the provinces, it becomes necessary to admit them by similar reciprocal legislation from several other countries, I answer that like enactments would in all such cases prove highly advantageous to the United States, and that the law might safely and beneficially be extended so as to admit also on the same terms of mutually free import and export the same articles from every nation in the world. Our supplies would be little increased by such arrangements, but our markets would be immensely extended.

There is much in British policy which would serve as a warning to us—much to be condemned—much serving to teach us what we should always shun as examples; but we cannot imitate a better or more honorable precedent than the removal of taxes from human food, from the daily bread and nutriment of men, women, and children, whether rich or poor. When the markets of Great Britain were in effect thrown open to the grain and provisions from the United States and the world, the old exclusive policy was reversed and one of the greatest triumphs of popular liberty, of progress toward the well-being of mankind was achieved. It is common to quote with admiration the sentiments of Greek and Roman orators, who, sometimes indeed, conquered the narrow limits of their creed and ceased to treat the masses with contempt; but I hold in higher esteem and deem more consonant with justice, humanity, and the religion by which we profess to regulate our actions, those words of a modern statesman, Sir Robert Peel, who when renouncing the office of Prime Minister of England and severing all his old party ties, said, "I shall leave a name execrated, I know, by every monopolist, who, professing honorable opinions, would maintain protection for his own individual benefit; but it may be I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of good-will in the abodes of those whose lot it is to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, when they shall recollect their exhausted energies with abundant and untaxed food, the sweeter because no longer leavened by a sense of injustice." These words, it seems to me, contain in substance an essential portion of the principles by which we should be actuated in the imposition of all taxes—leaving free as water, light, and air those articles which are absolutely necessary for the sustenance of human life. Nor can I regard this principle as less applicable to the people of the United States than to those of the British provinces; and it may reasonably be hoped that in a fair conference between parties each of whom has so much to gain by commerce with the other and so much to lose by exclusive legislation, existing difficulties may be removed and the interests of both may be regarded and weighed in a just balance.

As regards the navigation of the St. Lawrence, I am not so much disposed as some others have been to find fault with the treaty because we have made less use of this river than was expected. They would have had an argument more in accordance with their usual method of reasoning, if the Canadian carriers had diverted more and more traffic from our own railroads, canals, and rivers, from our own ports on the lakes or the sea-coast. Looking forward with certainty to the time when the artificial barriers separating mankind on this continent shall be overthrown, and a system of free commercial intercourse exist throughout the whole of it, we should guard against the useless expenditure of human labor in constructing canals and docks or erecting cities in places where it will not be remunerative. As the cheapest and best routes are those which must ultimately prevail, the sooner competition is fairly open the better for the people—the greater will be the benefits received by the greatest number, without injustice to any. We cannot in the end prevent this consummation if we would, and we ought to have no desire to prevent it if we could. The city of New York, occupying a central position between the Alleghany mountains on the western and the Blue mountains on the eastern side, is preeminently the emporium of commerce on this continent. It is the market or exchange for chartering vessels. So true is this that shipbrokers are engaged there when the St. Lawrence is open in chartering vessels to go thence to Quebec for the purpose of carrying cargoes to European ports, thereby adding the cost of a long and circuitous route to their expenses, instead of making a direct voyage across the Atlantic from New York. Freight is usually cheaper from Canada West via New York than the St. Lawrence, provided there are no governmental restrictions on either route.

The great increase in our trade with Canada, and the diminution of the exports and imports by that river immediately after the treaty, prove this broad fact. It was fully admitted by the Canadian minister in the establishment of discriminating and countervailing duties which, although injurious, were not sufficient to control fully the natural laws by which this commerce is regulated. The river at Quebec and Montreal is open only for about half the year; and yet docks, warehouses, hired attendants, and other necessary appliances of trade must be maintained for the whole year. The navigation, when open, is full of perils. Narrow straits, heavy fogs, strong currents, and dangerous ice, sometimes sunk beneath the water and unseen, beset the adventurous mariner. Eight steamships belonging to the line subsidized by the Canadian Government, with many passengers, have been lost since 1857; while the old Cunard line, established almost with the beginning of steam navigation on the ocean, has lost only one vessel and no passengers in the whole period of its existence. That solitary loss was on the coast of the provinces, and caused by the dense fogs and unexpected currents. The rates of freight on flour from Quebec to Liverpool are usually higher than they are from Buffalo, on Lake Erie, to Liverpool by way of New York. The same laws of trade determine the cheapest route as to more bulky articles. The rate of freight from that city to Europe is usually only one half the rate from Quebec. New York being the great port for the entry or arrival of merchandise or passengers, vessels coming to it receive remunerative rates on inbound cargoes; while going from Europe to Quebec they usually proceed in ballast, and hence are compelled to charge such a price for freight to the eastward alone as will yield them a profit both on the inward and outward passage.

Beyond the merely statistical views presented by the subject the relative position of the two countries forces itself upon our attention. They form together by far the larger portion of the vast North American continent, extending from one great ocean to the other. The neighboring British possessions reach down beyond the center of the region on this side of the Rocky mountains, and separate the wide and rich domain of the Northwest from those of the East, while on the northeast of the provinces our territory projects far between them and the great Atlantic highway of the world, thus pointing out clearly how advantageous, almost how necessary, mutual rights of way and free commercial union are to the people of each country through the territory of the other, unless we mutually condemn ourselves to a perpetual system of useless labor by carrying round the long projections made by the territories of each. We have in common the great lakes. As their country rests upon the Arctic seas, ours is washed by the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico. Between us we have so great a variety of soil and climate as to be capable of yielding almost every production necessary or conducive to the comfort and happiness of civilized man. There is no reason why the commercial relations of the States and provinces cannot be mutually as beneficial as those of the different States are to each other. The wages of labor, which, it is held by some, debar us from unrestricted commercial intercourse with other countries, least we reduce the remuneration of our own people to the European or Asiatic standard, are on ordinary occasions nearly equal on both sides of the frontier. The impediments to free communication exist only through laws made by man, and which we and those with whom we have to negotiate can make or unmake as we choose. Why, then, by governmental action seek to force the capital, labor, and traffic of the two countries into barren and wasteful channels, instead of mutually protecting home industry by permitting it to attain its most profitable results? Difficulties which now appear to be insuperable may vanish before united effort and by the conference of intelligent commissioners on both sides.

Revenge and retaliation are sentiments by which the mind and policy of a true statesman can never be governed. It was well said by De Tocqueville, who had not before him the illustration of his subject furnished to us by the condition of our own country at this day:

"The first notion which presents itself to a party, as well as to an individual, when it has acquired a consciousness of its own strength, is that of violence; the notion of persuasion arises at a later period, and is derived from experience."

Let us, at least, try what can be done through reason and negotiation, before we resort to a rupture of the existing ties and undo the work already accomplished in the right direction, after much effort.

I trust there are few who deem it the part of wisdom or sound policy, or consistent with due regard to the character of the nation represented by us here, to attach any weight to whatever ebullitions of temporary ill-will may have arisen from individuals in the provinces or Great Britain. These manifestations, having their sources in ignorance or unworthy motives, may safely be left to the class of minds in which they originated. Instead of degrading this House to that ignoble level, let us in conformity with our own dignity and honor aspire to be the leaders in such a wise and enlightened policy as, instead of irritating the people of the colonies and inducing them to mistake a pitiful hatred to this country for patriotism toward their own, shall aid and assist liberal statesmen on either side of our northern boundary or of the Atlantic ocean in their efforts to develop those mutual interests constituting a great international law, and which are the more clearly seen to be harmonious and identical the more closely they are examined.

By adopting the principle of commercial retaliation or exclusion we can injure the people of the provinces; but in hostilities of this kind, as well as in actual warfare, although one party often suffers more than the other, yet both are injured. It may be that, even although we adopt an isolating policy, the people of the provinces will be too wise to exclude our products from their markets on the present terms of equality and freedom. Canada at least admitted them without duty before the treaty—a liberal policy, dictated on her part by the soundest financial considerations, for while her people were benefited by cheaper prices on some commodities, it drew trade to her canals, seaports, and shipping. Even this has been turned into an argument against our practicing the same system toward her. It was rather an example of a just and comprehensive idea of self-interest for our imitation, by no longer refusing our forwarders permission to carry her products to the ocean on our canals and railroads for remunerative and satisfactory prices. The course pursued by Canada before the treaty is probably a fair indication of the course she would adopt if it were unconditionally annulled and we should show ourselves determined to maintain an exclusive position.

Until 1847 the produce of the colonies was admitted under special privileges into the markets of Great Britain, but when these were removed the authority of that country over the financial affairs of the colonies was also relaxed. At that time the Canadian duties on American manufactures were seven and a half per cent. more than on similar articles made in Great Britain, but one of the first uses made by the colonies of their increased power was to equalize taxation on the manufactures of both countries by a uniform tariff of seven and a half per cent. on all.

As colonies of Great Britain the provinces may easily return to preferential duties in favor of the nation with which they are politically connected. If they did not establish between themselves and the mother country a system of imports, exports, and transit, entirely free, like that prevailing between the different States of this Union, they might have recourse to direct taxation, and adopt so low a rate of duties on the products of all the nations of the world that it would be almost impossible to enforce the tariff of the United States along the vast frontier of the North. Already the project of unlimited free trade finds its advocates in Canada, and leading organs of public opinion, while admitting the benefits of reciprocity to them, and affirming their readiness to do all that consistently with their own honor can be done by them to maintain the most friendly commercial relations with us, significantly intimate that a different course, perhaps in the end not less beneficial, is open to them.

There is little room for doubt that if we rashly and persistently pursue a hostile and exclusive system, most of this trade now in our possession will be divided between the colonies themselves and Great Britain. The provinces will be compelled to execute their old project of an intercolonial railroad from Halifax and St. John, and perhaps other ports, to the interior of their country, thus completing the only remaining link in their present vast system of internal communication, and giving them uninterrupted access from Lake St. Clair and Lake Huron to the ocean, through their own territory, at all periods of the year. Their people, by commercially uniting the provinces together, may soon accomplish the development of a system of home industry which will make them independent of our manufactures, and competitors with us in every neutral market. They will become their own shippers and traders for all commodities of foreign origin. Although we may banish them and their produce and merchandise from our routes of communication with the Atlantic, it is not likely we shall divert the traffic in American produce via the St. Lawrence by any legislation we can adopt. We cannot legislate for the Canadians. We can cut them off from the use of our railroads and canals, but may fail in persuading them to adopt legislation of the same suicidal character. It is to be expected that they will keep their channels for freight open to our produce. We cannot compel them to grant us a monopoly of this kind; but if we should exclude them from our thoroughfares, their carrying system will reap the benefit of doing business for both countries—we transacting a part of it for one only—and we shall present to the world the instructive but undignified spectacle of men who, instead of cherishing this branch of our industry and directing it to the full fruition of its natural advantages, sever it from the trunk, even while it is supporting us.

Let those whose duty it is to watch over and promote the permanent and substantial interests of the country be led away by no narrow view, no temporary and transient feeling, but consider and reflect upon the calm and sober judgment formed in times of less excitement, by themselves, the statesmen who have gone before them, and the nation at large. "There has not," said Henry Clay, often called the author of the American system, "been a moment since the adoption of the present Constitution when the United States have not been willing to apply to the trade between them and the British colonies principles of fair reciprocity and equal competition." As it was with him so also was it with Adams, Webster, Van Buren, Marcy, Douglas, and all those of every party who have left among us an enduring fame as statesmen.

The appointment of commissioners on both sides to consult carefully as to the course most conducive to our mutual benefit appears to be less liable to objection and to combine more advantages than any other plan. On our side there are varied interests to be consulted—those of the eastern, central, and western States, whether they more especially consist in the promotion of manufactures, agriculture, or commerce, or in the united and harmonious progress of all these pursuits. On the side of the colonies, are separate legislatures or governments of several provinces where different views will be taken on many points of detail, perhaps of economical principles. The whole will require so much consideration that I should despair of complete success unless it should receive full and undivided attention. It will be the duty of such commissioners to ascertain how far we may remove the obstacles which since the date of the treaty have, through the legislation of Canada, impeded the trade of our great commercial cities, impaired our manufacturing interests, and tended to diminish the amount of inland navigation and transit trade which would otherwise have accrued to the States bordering on the British provinces.

We are too apt to think the interests of the nation can only be advanced at the expense of injury to another. In reality and under a true system of reciprocity each of us would receive the benefits of natural advantages enjoyed by the other, which in its turn is benefited, not by withholding participation but by inviting it. This principle is as true and should be as universally admitted as those of mechanical improvements or labor-saving machinery. Hence, the words of the resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of New York express clearly and definitely the principle by which we should be guided, saying: "that free commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American provinces and possessions, developing the natural, geographical, and other advantages of each, for the good of all, is conducive to the present interest of each, and is the only proper basis of our intercourse for all time to come." It has been well illustrated by a French writer in the fable of the blind man and the lame, who between them possessed all that was necessary for both. One guided the other, who in his turn was carried, and each receiving important benefits disdained too close inquiry as to which of the two rendered the most important service.

We are considering the commercial relations of one eighth of the habitable surface of the world. Of this vast region, the United States and the people of the colonies, subject to a beneficent Providence, control the present condition and shape the future history. It has been given to us, in the maturity of human civilization, as a new parchment on which we may inscribe whatever characters we choose; and the opportunity will never return again in all the plenitude of the present time. With nations, as with individuals, those habits and tendencies are easily formed in youth, which are afterwards developed and control the career through long years or centuries of the future. We may differ from the people of the provinces in opinion as to the best form of government, but other nations can judge better for themselves than we can for them as to their own method of legislation. A prohibitory or exclusive system would be no less unnatural and injurious as to every commercial, political, and moral result than if we separated New York from Massachusetts, and both of these from Ohio, Illinois, or Iowa. Let us then regulate our intercourse, not by mutual fear or destruction, but by creating, or rather by developing, reciprocal benefits in accordance with the manifest designs of Him who made the world, and who should never be mentioned except upon occasions worthy of Him. Such a system is doubly beneficial—

"It droppeth, as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath: it is twice blessed;
It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes."

Under its influence, assisted by a wise application of the reason with which man is endowed, old animosities will be forgotten, and in days to come the people of both countries, seeing plainly that the social body of mankind, like the material body of the individual, is provided by nature with a healing power, will find additional reasons to reverence Him by whom the universe itself was framed.

Mr. PIKE obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. STEVENS. I should like to take up an appropriation bill, unless there is some special reason why we should go on with the reciprocity treaty matter to-day.

Mr. ARNOLD. I suggest that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] be permitted to make his speech, and then let the matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. STEVENS. If this matter can be finished to-day, I have no objection to allowing the debate to go on; otherwise I will move to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of but two gentlemen who desire to speak, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania must decide for himself.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate have passed without amendment a joint resolution of this House (No. 72) relative to pay of staff officers of the Lieutenant General.

Also, that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 176) authorizing the erection of buildings for the branch mint at San Francisco, having been corrected, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House; and

An act (No. 250) making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 185) to establish a postal money order system; and

An act (H. R. No. 370) to appoint certain officers of the Navy.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FRANK in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 240) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1865.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, the first reading was dispensed with, and the bill was read by paragraphs for amendments.

Under the head of "Chippewas of Lake Superior," the following paragraph being under consideration—

For tenths of twenty installments in coin, goods, household furniture, and cooking utensils, agricultural implements, and cattle, carpenters' and other tools, and building materials, and for moral and educational purposes, per fourth article treaty 30th September, 1854, $19,000—

Mr. BROOKS asked an explanation of the payment "in coin" provided for.

Mr. STEVENS. That is in accordance with treaty stipulation.

Mr. BROOKS. Gold coin?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know that it says "gold coin;" it says "coin."

Mr. BROOKS. I thought, perhaps, it was a misprint, and meant corn.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir, coin; these Indians are a hard money people. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. I wish the whites were, too.

Mr. STEVENS. The whites are more civilized.

Under the heading of "Chippewas of the Mississippi, and the Pillager and Lake Winnebagoish bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota," the following paragraph being under consideration—

For the employment of a sawyer, at the discretion of the President, and to remove the saw-mill from Gull Lake reservation to the new reservation set apart, and to extend the road between Gull Lake and Leach Lake to the junction of the Mississippi and Leach Lake rivers, and to remove the agency to said junction, or as near as practicable, $3,000—

Mr. BROOKS said: I desire an explanation of that item. Is it in accordance with treaty stipulation?

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will turn to page 89 of the estimates he will find it all set forth there.

Mr. BROOKS. I have not the estimates before me. I ask the gentleman to read it.

Mr. STEVENS. The treaties under which these appropriations are made are not set forth in the estimate, but reference is made to the article and treaty. All these appropriations are under the treaty of March, 1863.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to amend the bill in line six hundred and eighteen, by adding the following:

For payment of expenses incident to the removal of the Quapaw Indians from Kansas, and their reestablishment in their own country, $9,726 33.

I ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Secretary of the Interior upon that subject.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 15, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, of the 17th ultimo, and accompanying papers, showing that the sum of $9,726 33 is due to the Quapaw tribe of Indians, under treaty stipulations, as explained by the Commissioner and shown by the papers.

I recommend that an appropriation be made by Congress of the sum thus found to be due the Quapaws, to be applied to the payment of expenses incident to their removal from Kansas, and their reestablishment in their own country, from which they have been refugees in consequence of the rebellion.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. P. USHER, Secretary.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WINDOM. I have here the letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, stating this amount to be due under treaty stipulation, and also a statement to the same effect from the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, recommending the appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON. I move to amend by adding at the end of line seven hundred and twelve as follows:

For payment of interest to Orchard party and First Christian party Oneida Indians, New York, per treaty stipulation of 1838, $1,642 70.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if they are a part of the New York Indians.

Mr. FENTON. Yes, sir; but they do not include all the New York Indians. This is to pay the interest upon a principal sum of $6,000 under the stipulations of the treaty of 1838, which was subsequently paid, but the interest has not been paid. The Secretary of the Interior recommends that the appropriation be made.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me ask why this was not included in the original bill.

Mr. STEVENS. It must be some old claim, I imagine. It was not included in the regular estimate.

Mr. FENTON. The principal sum has been paid, but the interest has not been paid. The Secretary of the Interior, for the reasons set forth in this document, recommends the payment of this sum. It has been previously recommended, and the reason of the non-payment is here stated. I ask that the communications from the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 27, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated February 27, 1863, recommending that the sum of $1,642 70 be appropriated by Congress to pay that amount of interest due the Orchard party and First Christian party of New York Indians, as explained by the Commissioner.

In view of the facts as represented by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I concur with that officer in the recommendation he makes, and submit the subject for the favorable consideration of Congress.

A memorial of the Indians, including a power of attorney to J. N. Messenger to act for them, accompanies this communication.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. P. USHER, Secretary.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, February 27, 1863.

SIR: I have the honor to state that J. N. Messenger, Esq., has filed in this office a memorial and power of attorney of the chiefs of the Orchard party and First Christian party of the New York Indians, authorizing him to act in their behalf, and asking for the payment of interest on $6,000, stipulated to be paid by the treaty of 1838, for certain lands purchased by the United States, lying near Green Bay, Wisconsin, which sum of $6,000 was appropriated June 27, 1846, and paid in 1851. (See Statutes at Large, volume seven, page 554.)

A similar petition of these Indians was filed in this office in 1851, by G. R. Herrick, their attorney at that time; the office considering the claim just and equitable, thereupon Commissioner Lea recommended the payment of interest on $6,000, from June 27, 1846, the date of the act making the appropriation of the principal, to January 18, 1851, when it was decided by the Department that the claim should be paid. And in his special estimate of funds required for the service of the Indian department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852, he asked for the sum of $1,642 70 for the adjustment of the claim. (See Senate Documents, first session Thirty-Second Congress, volume 3, pages 561, 564, 569, and 570.)

In view of the action of this office heretofore, I concur in its decision, and would respectfully recommend that you submit this claim to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, with recommendation that this amount ($1,642 70) be attached to some appropriation bill.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM P. DOLE,
Commissioner.

Hon. J. P. USHER, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FENTON. It came too late to make the appropriation in the bill, and hence I have been compelled to bring it before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the date of that communication?

Mr. FENTON. April 27, 1864.

Mr. BROOKS. This is a most objectionable way of doing business. I do not know that the appropriation is not all right. It seems to be the insertion of a claim in one of the general appropriation bills, in reference to which I might make a point of order. I do make the point of order that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late, debate having taken place on the amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. This matter ought to be sent to the Committee of Claims or to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the House ought to have a report of the facts. It seems to me to be an old claim. The estimates are not of record except in the Congressional Globe, and we can never trace them unless we follow the debates. It is an objectionable mode of making appropriations. The receiving communications from the Departments, after the bill has been reported and acted upon, as if they were regularly submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, or any other committee of this House, is a new mode which has sprung up within the last three or four years. To my mind it is an objectionable mode of making appropriations of money.

Mr. FENTON. I know nothing of the claim except what is set forth in the documents which have been read by the Clerk. It reached the Committee of Ways and Means too late to act on it with the other appropriations of the bill.

The committee was divided; and there were—ayes twenty-four, noes not counted.

Mr. FENTON. I withdraw the amendment. The Clerk read, as follows:

For expenses of transportation and delivery of annuity goods to the Blackfeet Indians for the year, $17,000.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move to strike out "$17,000," and in lieu thereof to insert "$10,000."

Mr. Chairman, by turning to page 3 of the bill there is an appropriation for the Blackfeet Indians of $20,000 for the ninth of ten installments as annuity, to be expended in the purchase of such goods, provisions, and other useful articles as the President at his discretion may from time to time determine, per ninth article of the treaty of October 17, 1855. The provision which I propose to amend appropriates $17,000 for the transportation of that $20,000 of goods. It must be recollected that this transportation is by a navigable river, the Missouri river, to the point where the goods are to be delivered. I am satisfied under the circumstances that $17,000 is too large a sum, and I am satisfied that $10,000 is an amount amply sufficient for the transportation of these goods. I will say that they were transported last year at six cents per pound, and I understand that the same parties are willing and able to transport them at the same price this year. I hope, therefore, that my amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. I apprehend if the gentleman from Iowa were familiar with the cost of transportation there he would not have moved this amendment. This appropriation is based upon an estimate made by the Indian department, who are aware of the cost of transportation from year to year. They have asked for a sum that will cover the cost of this transportation. If the Missouri river is navigable at the time, the cost of transporting these goods may be less than $17,000; but if, on the other hand, the river is not navigable, it is questionable whether that sum will cover the transportation. I will say to my friend from Iowa that the Missouri river at that point is navigable in the most favorable seasons only two months out of the twelve, and frequently goods which have been sent up to that point have had to be landed at points three, four, and five hundred miles below, and then transported by land.

Mr. GRINNELL. What is the character of those goods?

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. They are of all kinds. There are dry goods, groceries, farming utensils, machinery for a mill, and a great variety of other goods, all covered by this appropriation.

Mr. GRINNELL. Are there any groceries?

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. Yes, sir; but there are not any liquors among them.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman whether goods for this same purpose were not transported last year for six cents per pound, and whether last year was not one of the driest seasons for the last ten years? And was not the Missouri river lower last year than it has been at any period during the last ten years?

Mr. McBRIDE. I will say that I was informed by the agent of the Blackfeet Indians—a gentleman who has been an Indian agent for many years—that last year the cost of transporting goods sent to that country exceeded the actual cost of the goods.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I know that the contractor transported those goods up the Missouri river last year, and part of the way by land, and I understand further that he got but six cents per pound for the transportation. I am informed that Mr. Lalarge, who transported those goods last year, offered to transport them this year for six cents per pound, but I believe he did not make a formal bid.

Mr. McBRIDE. To what point?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. To Fort Benton.

Mr. McBRIDE. They go much further than that.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. And I am informed further that a contract has been entered into for the transportation of these identical goods at a sum ranging from eight to twelve cents per pound.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. That is a question between the Indian department and my friend from Iowa. If that department has exceeded its authority, if it has made a contract injurious to the Government, it must be responsible for that act. It may be true—and I do not question the fact as stated by the gentleman from Iowa—that a contract may have been entered into last year for the transportation of goods to Fort Benton for six cents a pound, and I presume the department is in possession of information that the parties who entered into that contract lost largely by it, and that the transportation of the goods was delayed for a long time in consequence of that low figure, and that the Indian service in that section suffered in consequence of it, and that the Indian department in their estimates now seek to guard against a contingency of that kind in the future. And I presume that this estimate is made upon information in their possession which is satisfactory to them, and that the sum asked for here is nothing more than what would be right and proper.

I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that these goods have to be transported much further than Fort Benton. They may go that far by steamer, but from that point they have got to go into the interior, where the cost of transportation is heavy indeed. That is a matter, I have no doubt, which the Indian department has taken into consideration in making up the estimate.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Are not these goods always delivered at Fort Benton and at points below? I happen to live upon the Missouri river, and to know something about the transportation of these goods. And I happen to know something about the Missouri river; and I know the fact that these Indian goods, as a general rule, almost without exception, are transported in the spring months when the river is high and when boats can reach Fort Benton without difficulty. Last season was the only season within the last ten years in which there has been any difficulty in reaching Fort Benton.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. What has been may be again, and to guard against that the department has asked for a sum to meet a contingency of that kind. This is no more than will be necessary. If not necessary the money will not be drawn out of the Treasury; if more than necessary, the object of the appropriation is accomplished and the service will be performed to the benefit of the Indians and of the Government.

Mr. GRINNELL. Did the gentleman ever know of any money remaining unexpended out of an appropriation for carrying goods?

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. I cannot say to the gentleman whether such a thing has ever occurred or not. I presume—and that is a fair presumption in law—that if there has none remained it was properly and legitimately appropriated.

Mr. GRINNELL. A violent presumption.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. I understand that the appropriation here is no more than will be necessary to meet contingencies which have happened heretofore, and which may happen again. For that reason I hold that this appropriation should be made as asked for. If it is, and the service is not performed, let the contingencies be what they may, then the Interior Department is responsible to the country and to the people for that failure. If we refuse to grant them what they deem necessary for the performance of this service the responsibility of the failure to perform it will be with us, and we shall relieve the Indian department from it. For these reasons I hope that the motion made by the gentleman from Iowa will not prevail.

Mr. STEVENS. What it may cost to transport $20,000 worth of heavy goods, provisions, implements, and other goods, from where they are purchased to the Blackfeet Indians, I am not a very good judge of; but they live, as the gentleman must know, considerably beyond Fort Benton, and the goods have to be delivered to the tribe. They live both north and west of Fort Benton, and I should judge, from what I have learned, from three to five hundred miles from it.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I was well acquainted with the former agent of the Blackfeet Indians, and have conversed with him upon this subject. I learned from him that all the goods for the Blackfeet Indians were delivered last year at Fort Benton or at points below that fort. That has been the case for the last two years.

Mr. STEVENS. The goods may have been delivered at Fort Benton, but they have had to be transported thence some three or five hundred miles to the country of the Blackfeet Indians. At whose expense is that done? The treaty requires that the goods shall be delivered to them. I do not know where the agent receives the goods, but I venture to say that if he receives them at Fort Benton or below that point he charges for their transportation to the Indian country.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. The agent went to his agency last year upon the boat transporting the goods, and as a general rule the goods are delivered from the boat to the Indians. That has been the practice heretofore.

Mr. STEVENS. These goods are purchased always I believe in New York.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. The Indians come to the river and receive the goods from the boat. They are not transported back into the interior by the party who undertakes to carry the goods; they are delivered to the Indians in the presence of the agent upon the river at the points where the boats land.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know how the fact is as to the points where the Indians receive the goods, but they must come four or five hundred miles from their own country to receive them; and I do not believe that they have carried them home themselves without some allowance. I think that for carrying the goods from New York to the Indian country the sum estimated is a small amount.

Now, I know that the Government has been paying for transportation for about the same distance, from Fort Leavenworth to Salt Lake City, twenty dollars instead of six dollars per hundred pounds. That has been the contract for years. But what is very conclusive, if the Department is honest, is that for three years past we have appropriated precisely the same sum; and in estimating the unexpended balances, it is estimated that there has been none unexpended of these items for the last two years. Unless, therefore, there is some fraud in the Department, the sum of $17,000 must be appropriated. That was the exact sum which we appropriated last year and the year before, and there was no surplus.

The question was taken on Mr. HUBBARD's amendment, and there were—ayes 48, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS and HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to insert, on page 49, after line eleven hundred and eighty-one, the following:

For general incidental expenses and for transportation of goods for the Indian service in Utah for the year ending 30th June, 1864, $37,500.

I yield to the gentleman from Utah, who, I understand, has some documents relating to this subject.

Mr. KINNEY. All I desire is to have the Clerk read some communications from the Interior Department, which I will send to the Clerk's desk, showing the necessity for this appropriation. I will say further, that the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, asking for an additional appropriation, is designed to cover a deficiency in the present fiscal year in the Indian service for the Territory of Utah. The last appropriation by Congress was $25,000. In consequence of the disturbed condition of the Indians in that Territory, the severity of the winter, and the extremely high price of provisions, that appropriation was exhausted within the first six months of the fiscal year, and therefore the Secretary of the Interior has very properly estimated for the deficiency, and it should be attached either to this or some other bill.

It was the desire of the Department to have the estimate for this deficiency incorporated into the deficiency bill; but when it was sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, the deficiency bill was before a committee of conference, and the committee only having jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes, of the two Houses, the estimate could not be attached to the deficiency bill where it more properly belonged. It was then referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and as it met with the approval of that committee it is offered as an amendment to this bill.

I will now ask the Clerk to read the communications which show the cause of the deficiency, and the necessity for the appropriation.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 22, 1864.

SIR: Herewith I have the honor to transmit copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the 15th instant, with inclosure, relative to an appropriation required for the Indian service in Utah, and to state that the measure recommended by the Commissioner has heretofore received my approval in letters addressed to the proper committees of Congress, of the 1st instant.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. P. USHER, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM, Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 1, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication of the 26th ultimo from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, asking an appropriation of $15,000 to meet a deficiency in the appropriation of 3d March, 1863, for general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Utah Territory for the present fiscal year, and of $22,500 for expenses of transportation of supplies for the Indians in that Territory.

I concur in the views expressed by the Commissioner as to the necessity and expediency of these appropriations, and respectfully recommend that they be made.

The accompanying letter of the Commissioner and late superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Utah will, it is believed, afford full information on the subject.

I am, sir, with much respect, your obedient servant,
J. P. USHER, Secretary.

Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, February 26, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to refer herewith the copy of a communication from Governor James Duane Doty, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Utah, dated the 20th instant, from which it will appear that he was forced during the last summer, in order to terminate the hostilities then existing between the Indians and the whites, to use liberally out of the appropriation for the present fiscal year, in presents, &c., to the Indians, and that since then, during the present winter, Amos Reed, Esq., acting Governor, now in charge of Indian affairs in Utah, has been compelled, owing to the unparalleled severity of the weather and the extraordinary sufferings of the Indians caused thereby, to further draw upon the current funds so as to exhaust the appropriation for the present fiscal year ($25,000) in order to prevent the Indians by their hostilities from obstructing the western road at Deep creek and Shell creek. Hence the Governor recommends that a special appropriation of $15,000 be asked of Congress to meet the deficiency in the appropriation for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1864.

I cannot conclude my notice of the contents of Governor Doty's letter without recording my disapprobation of the responsibility taken both by himself and acting Governor Reed, in making such disbursements as to exhaust the current funds in so short a time, thus seriously embarrassing the department. It is true that the appropriation of $25,000 was very small, yet it was all that Congress saw proper to give for the Indian service in Utah, and the officials should have governed themselves accordingly.

It is useless, however, to retrospect upon the subject; a great necessity is now upon this office, which I am forced to yield to, by most respectfully suggesting that you will call the attention of the proper committee in Congress to the matter, that the $15,000 may be placed at the disposal of your Department to carry out the purposes named in the Governor's letter.

In the above connection I would also beg leave to state that a portion of the supplies for the Indians in Utah for the present fiscal year will, from motives of economy, have to be purchased on the Atlantic slope, and it is estimated that in bulk they will amount to seventy-five tons, and the cost of transportation thereof, owing to the great distance, will cost more than the original purchase, approximating to, if not exceeding, $300 per ton, making an aggregate of $22,500.

There being no funds now at the disposal of this office to accomplish the foregoing object, it will require an appropriation of $22,500 in addition to the $15,000 asked for as a deficiency.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. P. DOLE, Commissioner.

Hon. J. P. USHER, Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, March 15, 1864.

SIR: Referring to my report of the 26th ultimo, relative to an appropriation required for the Indian service in Utah, I have the honor to refer herewith copies of a letter from Amos Reed, Esq., acting Governor of Utah, of the 24th ultimo, that said copies may be transmitted to the proper committees in Congress, in order that those bodies may be fully advised of the threatening state of Indian affairs in Utah, and the necessity of the immediate appropriation before asked for.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. P. DOLE, Commissioner.

Hon. J. P. USHER, Secretary of the Interior.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 20, 1864.

SIR: The acting superintendent of Indian affairs in Utah has requested that a sum of money may be placed to his credit to meet the current and extraordinary expenditures to which the superintendency has been subjected during the past season, and to make up the deficiency for the last and present quarters.

He states that "since about the 1st of December to the present time (February 3) we have had a heavy layer of snow, at least one foot deep, and in some parts more, all over these valleys. It is the most severe winter for several years. Of course it has been very hard on the poor Indians, who have flocked to this superintendency from all quarters much more than any previous winter we have been here. I have been obliged to furnish them with food and clothing, which has been done as economically as possible, but yet to a considerable extent they must have assistance or actual starvation must ensue. The Indians got uneasy and threatening out on the western road, at Deep creek and Shell creek. The stage men and General Connor became quite alarmed, fearing an outbreak. I at once furnished those Indians with clothing and beef, and shall be obliged to furnish them more soon, and this must be continued until spring opens, when they can find roots, &c., to live upon."

In addition to the above, which I beg leave to earnestly commend to your notice, I would state that I was compelled to use the funds of the superintendency very liberally for presents of provisions and clothing during the last summer and autumn to the several tribes of the Utah and Shoshone nations, in order to terminate the hostilities then actually existing between them and the whites, and to stop their depredations upon the overland mail line. Terms of peace were happily effected; but it became necessary on this account to exceed the usual current expenses of the superintendency, for which the funds provided would have been ample; but no provision having been made for the extraordinary state of affairs which occurred, I was compelled to avail myself of the means appropriated for these expenses in the performance of my duties to the Government.

I would therefore respectfully recommend that a special appropriation be asked of Congress to meet the deficiency in the appropriation for 1864, and the extraordinary expenditures required to be made by the acting superintendent for the relief of the destitute Indians, of $15,000.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES DUANE DOTY,
Late Superintendent Indian Affairs, Utah Territory.
Hon. THE COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. STEVENS. I know nothing about the matter except what is contained in these papers. Probably some gentlemen can inform the committee as to the facts.

Mr. WINDOM. I presume that the Delegate from Utah has all the information on the subject. I have none myself except what I gather from these papers. The Committee on Indian Affairs thought that the appropriation should be made.

Mr. KINNEY. Mr. Chairman, the papers that have been read from the Clerk's desk place the House in possession of all the facts on which the additional appropriation is asked for. The last Congress made an appropriation of $25,000 for the present fiscal year. The late superintendent, Governor Doty, states that in consequence of the severity of the winter, and the threatening attitude of the Indians, it was necessary to draw largely on the appropriation, and the result is that the appropriation was not only exhausted within the first half of the fiscal year, but the superintendency is actually at this time several thousand dollars in debt.

The object of the amendment then is, Mr. Chairman, to pay off these debts, to purchase the usual supply of provisions, and to pay the transportation on the goods and provisions from the Missouri river to the several tribes of Indians in the Territory of Utah. It has been the custom of the superintendent of Utah to make presents of flour, tobacco, blankets, &c., to the Indians of Utah for a number of years past, upon the very wise policy that it is much cheaper to feed and clothe the Indians than to fight them. These presents they expect and have a right to receive. In no other way can you keep them in subordination. Thousands of dollars are annually expended by the citizens of Utah in donations, as an act of charity to the Indians, to make up for the meager appropriations of Congress to these the wards of the General Government. This has been for years an onerous tax upon the people, which they cannot longer bear.

Refuse to make this appropriation asked for by the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and sought to be obtained by the amendment offered, and there is not a dollar for the purchase of flour, or the transportation of goods for this year, those necessary and usual presents which the Indians have been accustomed to receive, or for the payment of existing obligations which have been unavoidably incurred. I speak of flour, Mr. Chairman, as it is now from fifteen to twenty dollars a hundred in Utah, and difficult to obtain in consequence of its scarcity except for the actual necessities of the people. In consequence of the scarcity of water in Utah last season for irrigating purposes, the ordinary crop of wheat was not raised, and the unusual demand for supplying immigration, and the miners of Idaho, and the consumption by your army stationed at Great Salt Lake City, ostensibly to protect immigration and the overland mail from Indian depredations, have well-nigh exhausted the entire crop. The purchase of this article for the Indian service during the past winter, at the high price which it readily commanded in the market, tended greatly to exhaust the appropriation, which, as the Commissioner well says in his communication, was but a small one.

Withhold the appropriation for the destitute and starving Indians of Utah, and murder and plunder are the inevitable consequences; possibly a general uprising among the Indians of Utah, because their "great father" has refused to make provision for their pressing wants. Their game has disappeared, their country reduced to intelligent cultivation, and the Indians of Utah are almost wholly dependent upon the Government for subsistence. If this appropriation is withheld, I fear the war-whoop will again be sounded, and the war-path again resumed. I know something, Mr. Chairman, of Indian character, and am familiar with the atrocities which have been committed by the Indians of Utah upon unsuspecting citizens and unoffending emigrants. Many, very many of both classes have lost their lives, and fallen victims to Indian cupidity and Indian revenge. The Indians of Utah are upon the great highway to the Pacific, upon the line of your overland mail, and upon the emigrant road which leads to the gold-fields of California, Montana, and Idaho. In no Territory are so many vital interests at stake, and in no one is it so important to secure and maintain peaceful relations with the Indians as in Utah. Experience has proved that those relations are more securely established, more humanely and economically maintained by presents and kind treatment, than by standing armies, bullets and shell. I repeat, withhold the appropriation which has become necessary in consequence of this very humane and prudent policy having been adopted, and you not only expose the citizens of Utah to Indian depredation and hostility, but you also expose the lives of the passengers and drivers upon the overland mail, and also the lives of men, women, and children who are seeking future homes in the new Eldorado of the teeming West. Are gentlemen willing to assume this great responsibility? I ask if they are willing to expose the lives of their own citizens who, stimulated by a spirit of enterprise, are on their way to Montana and Idaho, pioneers in the great march of progress and of empire?

As this appropriation is sanctioned by the Department of the Interior, approved by the Committee on Indian Affairs, necessary, in my judgment, to preserve peace with the Indians, I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. McINDOE. Is there any treaty existing between the Government of the United States and these Utah Indians?

Mr. KINNEY. There never has been the usual treaty with these Indians. They are situated differently from most of the other Indians of the country. They have been kept in tolerable subjection and subordination only through the presents made to them through the Indian superintendency.

Mr. McINDOE. What has been the amount heretofore appropriated for this purpose?

Mr. KINNEY. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. McINDOE. So much as that?

Mr. KINNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. McINDOE. Always?

Mr. KINNEY. I do not know that Congress has always appropriated that amount. That is the sum appropriated by last Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. These appropriations are mere annuities voted from year to year, which are expended among the Indians for the purpose of keeping them quiet. Twenty-five thousand dollars has been the sum usually appropriated.

Mr. KINNEY. Yes, sir, that has been the sum. There are about twelve thousand Indians in the Territory of Utah. The settlements in that country commenced in 1850. Since that time the settlements have been maintained there and have been rapidly increasing, and I think the Government has been very negligent in not treating with these Indians as they have done with the Indians in the other Territories. They ought long ago to have been under treaty obligations.

I will state further that the entire amount appropriated for these Utah Indians is only $25,000, and does not near come up to the appropriations for the Indian service in New Mexico by this very bill.

Mr. STEVENS. It has not been submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. KINNEY. It was submitted to the chairman of that committee.

Mr. SHANNON. I hope this amendment will be agreed to. It is little, very little, that is asked for the purpose of treating with these Indians and bringing them as far as possible into the habits of civilized life. A great emigration is going over the plains through that country, and if men, women, and children are to be slaughtered in consequence of the Indians believing they have not been properly treated by the Government in order to avoid an appropriation of a few thousand dollars, it seems to me it is a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment, thirty-eight voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SHANNON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SHANNON and ENGLISH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 50.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The following paragraph of the bill being under consideration—

For subsistence and clothing, and general incidental expenses of the Sisseton, Walpatoon, Medawakanton, and Wahpakoota bands of Sioux or Dakota Indians, at their new homes, $150,000—

Mr. WINDOM. I move to amend by striking out "$150,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$75,000." If this amendment shall be adopted I propose to follow it up with another appropriating $75,000 for the support of the Winnebago Indians. The facts are these: in February, 1863, two bills were passed by Congress, one for the removal of these bands of Sioux Indians, and the other for the removal of the Winnebago Indians. They have been removed to the Upper Missouri river, and are now located at the same place. The Winnebagoes number about twenty-five hundred and the Sioux about thirteen hundred. We have appropriated in another portion of the bill for the support of the Winnebagoes, in pursuance of treaty stipulations, $54,000. We have no treaty stipulations with the Sioux Indians. All our treaties with them were abrogated by the act of February last, and this $150,000 is a mere gratuity to them. I do not think that as large an amount as that is necessary. I think $75,000 is quite sufficient for these thirteen hundred Indians, who have been guilty of every enormity men or devils could devise, and that if even $75,000 is given to them we ought to give the other $75,000 to these twenty-five hundred Winnebagoes who have always been friendly. I do not propose, therefore, either to increase or decrease this appropriation, but to divide it equally between the Sioux and Winnebagoes. The Sioux have in my State a large body of land, some nine hundred thousand acres, worth not less than $2,000,000, which is to be sold for their benefit. The Winnebagoes also have a considerable amount of land which has not yet been sold, and which is, therefore, not available for their maintenance. I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know that I understand the gentleman's amendment. If it is as I suppose, I do not know that I will object to it. The Winnebagoes, to whom the gentleman refers, have an annuity now under treaty stipulation. You have appropriated in this bill $54,000 for them. The Indians named above, the Indians with the hard names, were by an act of the last Congress ordered to be removed, and they have been removed. They are without treaty stipulations, and to support them at their new homes this appropriation is necessary.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to making this $100,000, but I want to apply the $50,000 to the Winnebagoes. They have not acted in bad faith, and they are good Indians if there are any good anywhere. I believe we ought to anticipate the sale of their lands.

Mr. STEVENS. The Department have not asked for anything of that kind; therefore while I go for striking off $50,000, I cannot go for the other part of the proposition.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. The Winnebago Indians are in a starving condition. I have letters proving the correctness of this statement. Many of them have actually starved to death. I am satisfied that an appropriation of $50,000 will not maintain them for the present year, while on the other hand $50,000 is more than adequate for the support of the Sissetons. The Sissetons are the worst enemies of the whites in the Northwest. They have been engaged in all the bloody massacres that have recently taken place. The Winnebagoes have always been friendly to the whites, while the Sissetons have always been enemies. Yet the committee propose by this bill to give to every man, woman, and child of the Sisseton Indians more than one hundred dollars each for the coming year. I think it is just and proper that a division of the sum should be made, and a portion given to the Sissetons and the remaining portion to the Winnebagoes.

Mr. WINDOM. I will modify my amendment so as to move to strike out the whole paragraph and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

For subsistence and clothing and general incidental expenses of the Sisseton, Walpatoon, Medawakanton, and Wahpakoota bands of Sioux or Dakota Indians, at their new homes, $100,050; and for subsistence and clothing and general incidental expenses of the Winnebago Indians at their new homes, $50,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is that odd fifty dollars for?

Mr. WINDOM. I will move to strike that out. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that my amendment does not increase the appropriation at all. It leaves it as before. There are, as I am informed, only about thirteen hundred Sioux, while the Winnebagoes number about two thousand five hundred. They are in a suffering condition; they need this money, and there can be no objection to this division of the appropriation. I believe it was recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, but by some mistake nothing was said about the Winnebagoes. I know something about these Indians. I have read a letter from the Governor of Dakota on the subject, in which he says they are in a very destitute condition. These Indians are friendly and need an additional appropriation. I hope that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the whole paragraph. I desire to amend the paragraph before the vote is taken on striking out. I move to strike out "and fifty," so as to leave it $100,000.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word in answer to an objection raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] He referred to the fact that the Winnebagoes were in the receipt of annuities. I understand that those annuities amount to but $50,000 per annum.

Mr. STEVENS. Fifty-four thousand dollars.

Mr. DONNELLY. So if the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota prevails, and an additional $50,000 is given them, the total amount going to the Winnebagoes will be $104,000, to be divided among twenty-five hundred persons. It is proposed at the same time to give $100,000 to thirteen hundred Sioux Indians. In other words, the Sioux are to receive twice as much as the Winnebagoes. What reason is given for this favoritism?

I need not enlarge upon the view presented by my colleague, that these Winnebago Indians have every claim upon our justice and our kindness. At a time when considerable temptation was held forth to them they remained at peace with the whites and faithful to their treaty obligations, while the Sioux Indians, on the other hand, have little or no claim upon our kindness or consideration save that which arises from a common humanity. I think, therefore, it would be unfair to give to those recreant Indians who have waged war upon the whites almost double what is given to those peaceful Indians against whom we have no serious cause of complaint. Hence I hope that the amendment of my colleague may prevail.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] by striking out "one hundred" and inserting "seventy-five," so that the clause will read "seventy-five thousand dollars" instead of "one hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. McINDOE. If it is in order, I move to amend the substitute by making the sum $50,000.

Mr. STEVENS. There has already been one amendment offered to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin proposes to offer an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. STEVENS. But the question must first be taken upon the motions to amend that which is proposed to be stricken out. I have moved to amend by striking out "$50,050," leaving the appropriation $100,000. The gentleman from Iowa moved to reduce the amount to $75,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. I accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the Chair now state the proposition before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] proposed a substitute for the entire paragraph. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] then moved to amend the existing paragraph. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] moved to amend that amendment, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania accepted the amendment as a modification of his own. The question is first upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as modified.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by striking out "seventy-five" and inserting "fifty." I move the amendment for the reason that I am satisfied that $50,000 is all that these Indians are entitled to. In fact, it is more than they are entitled to. There are no Indians in all the Northwest from whom the whites have suffered as much as from this band of Indians. Their hands are to-day red with the blood of their murdered victims, and I maintain that under such circumstances it is not the duty of the Government to make them pensioners. The number of these Indians, as I understand from good authority, is about thirteen hundred. Fifty thousand dollars appropriated for the maintenance of these Indians will give to each man, woman, and child, in the neighborhood of forty dollars. Enemies as they are, blood-stained as they are with the blood of their victims, I undertake to say that is enough for the Government to bestow upon them.

Upon the other hand I remark that the Winnebagoes are friendly, and have been so during all their past history, while the Sissetons have been our worst enemies. It is no time to bestow these gifts upon our enemies, for while we are talking about this appropriation we have a war with those Indians. A part of this very tribe is to-day engaged in a war against the whites, and are trying to exterminate them. They are now engaged in committing murders upon our frontiers. Under such circumstances $50,000 is more than they are entitled to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would ask the gentleman why we should appropriate anything for savages with whom we are at war?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I will give a reason for that. Most of the Indians that have been removed upon this agency are women and children. For that reason I am willing to give them a little something upon which they may be maintained and supported. I would contribute a little toward their maintenance, and I would make them work in order to raise the residue for their support.

Mr. STEVENS. When I practiced law, a few years ago, the court adopted a rule that they would not rely at all upon parole cases cited by a member of the bar. If he had his authority, let him read it. Now, I treat this case much in the same way. Here is an Indian department charged to examine into and report to us upon this case. They do so; and if they do not do it faithfully, they ought to lose their places; but excited gentlemen from the neighborhood, who have heard of certain atrocities perpetrated by the Indians, and who have not perhaps learned the whole facts, come here and attempt to overturn the whole written testimony and the requests of the Department. That, according to my idea, is not temperate legislation. If these Indians are in hostility against us, strike out the appropriation entirely and give them nothing. But the Department removed these Indians and promised to support them until they could support themselves. They are, therefore, entitled to this money. I have consented to vote for cutting it down to one half; but I do not mean by that that I would transfer it to the Winnebagoes, who have all they have asked for and all the Government has asked for. Under treaty stipulations we give them $54,000. If we take this amount away from "the blood-stained Indians," as they are called, I think we had better keep it ourselves.

Mr. WINDOM. This is a gratuity to the Sioux Indians, and why should we make a gratuity to them and none to the Winnebagoes?

Mr. STEVENS. We instructed the Department to remove them and support them.

Mr. WINDOM. We removed both tribes under the same act.

Mr. STEVENS. We abrogated the treaty of the one and we allowed the other to stand, which is an equivalent for the gratuity.

Mr. HALE. Did not the Interior Department estimate $150,000 for this purpose?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Then why not stand by that?

Mr. STEVENS. They estimated $150,000 for these "blood-stained Indians."

Mr. HALE. Then why not appropriate that amount?

Mr. STEVENS. Because it looks here as if parole statements are to override everything that the Department recommends. We have tried it once or twice to-day, but the House did not sustain us.

Mr. HALE. These Indians, I understand, have been removed to a far distant region, a barren country, where there is no game and where they can raise nothing. They must inevitably starve unless we appropriate something for their support. I hold it to be our duty as Christian and humane people not to allow Indians from whom we have taken a large and valuable country to starve to death for the want of the necessities of life. I understand that the Indian bureau have requested this sum for their support in order to carry out in good faith what we promised to do when we removed them. The Department know the wants of the Indians much better than we do, and know what amount is necessary to maintain them; and I think that in reducing the amount asked for, as is proposed here, we should not be doing justice either to ourselves or to the Indians.

I hope, therefore, that the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who knows something about the wants of the Indians and the duty of the Government toward them, will be sustained, and that we shall not leave these Indians to starve.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I wish to make but a single remark in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] He has referred to my statement as parole testimony. I have stated the truth here in regard to these Indians; and I know whereof I speak. I know that these Indians have been for years past engaged in depredations upon the white settlements in the Northwest.

Mr. HALE. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa if it is not the fact that a portion of the Indians who have been removed are Christian and civilized Indians, who took no part in the outbreak in Minnesota last year? I so understand.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. There may be a few of them occupying that position; and the $50,000 which I propose is amply sufficient for the maintenance and support of all the good Indians of that tribe. As to the bad Indians, the sooner they starve the better. Talk about parole statements! I repeat that I know whereof I speak. I have seen my own citizens weltering in their blood, slain by the hands of these murderous miscreants, and not a few of them, either.

This same tribe of Indians were the ringleaders in that fearful and bloody massacre that took place in Minnesota in the summer and autumn of 1862. They have been engaged in all the massacres that have occurred in the Northwest. It is true, a few of them may be good and friendly; and the $50,000 will make ample provision for all such. Those who are not friendly do not deserve that we should contribute anything for their maintenance and support.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, if we had an Indian orator here to tell us the story of his tribe, he would be as eloquent in the recital of their wrongs as the gentleman from Iowa is in his recital of the wrongs of the whites. So far as my experience and investigations have gone, they have taught me that, in nine cases out of ten, Indian wars have been produced by the provocations of the whites. The war may afterwards have been carried on barbarously. From the treaty of Colton to the present time, in nine cases out of ten, the breach of faith has come from the white man; and if the Indian had a historian he would put the pale face to the blush.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Chairman, there is one thing in this discussion which strikes me as being somewhat peculiar. It is, that gentlemen who are so earnest in pleading the cause of these murderous Indians and are so anxious to make them large gratuities when we owe them nothing, should at the same time resist the other part of the proposition which is to keep innocent and unoffending Indians from starvation. I did not desire to have the appropriation of $150,000 increased; but I cannot believe that these thirteen hundred Sioux, many of whom are murderers, should get $150,000 while twenty-five hundred peaceful and friendly Indians get only $54,000. I thought the money should be divided so as to confer a benefit on those Indians whom we all know to be comparatively good. The Sioux and the Winnebagoes live side by side—not half a mile apart. Are you going to pay a bounty to murder by giving to these blood-stained murderous Sioux five times as much per head as you give to the innocent Winnebagoes? When gentlemen are pleading for Indians I wish they would have some sympathy for the innocent as well as for the assassins of women and children.

The question being on Mr. HUBBARD's amendment to Mr. McINDOE's amendment, Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 45.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. McINDOE's amendment as amended; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. WINDOM's substitute.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to modify my substitute, so as to make it conform to the action of the committee, by giving $50,000 to each.

Mr. HALE. I object to that.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman can modify it, and the committee can vote it down.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it in order to move to strike out the word "new" and insert the word "temporary," so as to make it read "temporary home?"

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. In another section of this bill we have appropriated, under treaty stipulations, to the Winnebago Indians $54,000. That is all the treaty requires, and all the Department has asked for them. But the Department did ask for the appropriation contained in this section of the bill of $150,000, which, under the double motion of the gentleman from Iowa, has been stricken down to $50,000. If we now reject the proposition of the gentleman who offered the substitute it will stand $54,000 for the Winnebagoes and $50,000 for these other bands of Indians; but if we adopt the substitute of the gentleman from Iowa we shall strike out what has just been inserted and give $50,000 to these Sioux Indians and $50,000 to the Winnebagoes, in addition to the $54,000 appropriated in another part of the bill under treaty stipulations. I hope, therefore, the substitute will be rejected and that there will be no more effort by my colleague or any other gentleman to offer further amendments, but that we shall in the House vote down the amendment already adopted.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to state again how this will stand. We owe the Winnebago Indians $54,000 under treaty stipulations. That sum we propose to give them. We owe the Sioux Indians not one red cent. We propose to give them $50,000 as a gratuity; and if you give the Winnebagoes $50,000 in addition, it will about place them on the same footing, in proportion to their numbers, with the Sioux; while if all amendments are voted down, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania recommends, you will give $54,000 which you owe to twenty-five hundred friendly Winnebagoes, and $150,000 to these murderous Sioux, whom you owe nothing.

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman if they did not take a valuable tract of land amounting to nine hundred thousand acres, which was to have been sold for their benefit, but which was sold for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. WINDOM. I am very glad the gentleman has called my attention to that subject. The Government does hold nine hundred thousand acres, to be sold for the benefit of these Sioux.

Mr. HALE. And which was sold for their benefit at about the rate of one cent an acre, I believe.

Mr. WINDOM. No, sir; the gentleman is entirely mistaken; this Indian reservation has not been sold, not an acre of it. I presume this appropriation is in anticipation of the sale of these lands. I have no objection to giving fifty or seventy-five thousand dollars to the Sioux Indians, but what I claim is that you should give also to the comparatively innocent Winnebago Indians an amount that will be sufficient to keep them from starvation, who have also been removed, and whose lands in Minnesota have not yet been sold for their benefit. I repeat, that $104,000 in all will not be more for twenty-five hundred Winnebago Indians than $50,000 for thirteen hundred Sioux. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HALE,] whose sympathies are so much excited in behalf of the murderous Sissetons, ought to be willing at least to give the friendly Indians enough to keep them from starvation.

Mr. HALE. My amendment to the amendment is to strike out $50,000 and insert $70,000.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The substitute offered by Mr. WINDOM was rejected.

The following clause of the bill was read:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Idaho Territory, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $20,000.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. I move to amend by striking out "$20,000" and inserting "$25,000." I will state that the appropriation made for similar objects in all the other Territories is $25,000, while in the Territory of Idaho now there is a larger area of country and more Indians to take care of, and consequently more danger of collision between them and the whites than in any other Territory. I think the appropriation should be at least as large as for the other Territories.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That, in the absence of treaty stipulations to the contrary, when a member or members of any Indian tribe have received, or shall hereafter receive, a portion or portions of the tribal domain in severalty and the same is confirmed to them by patents in fee simple, they shall no longer be regarded as members of the tribe, nor can they be parties to treaties, nor be recognized as chiefs or counselors representing the tribe, unless thereafter adopted by it as members.

Mr. STEVENS. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order to an appropriation bill, as it changes the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I doubt whether the Chair understands the amendment, and I know the House does not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do. The Chair decided that my amendment was not in order, on the ground that it was not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a bill making appropriations according to law, and the amendment of the gentleman is of an entirely different character.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call attention to the fact that the amendment determines the way in which these appropriations shall be paid. I withdraw my appeal. I think the desire for dinner is above every consideration of public business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has based his decision on the opinions of others better qualified than himself.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FRANK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 240, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1865, which he was directed to report to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the House adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Pending the motion to adjourn, Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 251) to organize a regiment of veteran volunteer engineers;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) relative to pay of staff officers of the Lieutenant General;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) relating to Green Clay Goodloe; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) providing for the election of a member of Congress for the State of Illinois by the State at large.

VETERAN RESERVE CORPS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House in regard to invalids being recruited into the veteran reserve corps; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to.

And then (at twenty minutes to five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 19, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DIXON presented two memorials of citizens of Connecticut, and three memorials of citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. COWAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 377) making appropriations for the payment of the awards made by the commissioners appointed under and by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of the depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians," approved February 16, 1863, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a communication by telegraph of merchants of San Francisco, in relation to an extension of the time for payment of duty on goods in bond, reported a bill (S. No. 282) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes," approved 29th February, 1864; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FOSTEL, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of Alexander J. Atocha, praying for the payment of his claim against the republic of Mexico under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 281) for the relief of Alexander J. Atocha. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

LAND OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print one thousand additional copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the use of that office, to report it back and recommend its passage. This resolution comes to us from the Committee on Public Lands, who, the Committee on Printing suppose, understand the subject more than they themselves do, and on the faith of that recommendation they propose the publication. It will cost from seventy-five to one hundred dollars. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That one thousand additional copies of the last annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be printed for the use of that office.

OREGON DONATION CLAIMS.

Mr. HARDING. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 279) to amend the act of Congress making donations to settlers on the public lands in Oregon, approved September 27, 1850, and the acts amendatory thereto, have had it under consideration, and directed me to report it back and recommend its passage. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in all cases under the act of September 27, 1850, in which the actual settlement may be shown to be bona fide, and the claim in all respects to be fully within the requirements of existing laws, except as to the failure of the claimant to file notice within the period fixed by statute, such failure shall not work forfeiture when no adverse rights intervene before the filing of the required notification by the claimant.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, have directed me to report it back to the Senate with several amendments. I desire the Secretary to have the bill and amendments printed as quickly as possible, as I shall call it up at an early day.

Mr. SUMNER. Would it not be well to print some extra copies of the bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no; I do not think it necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would be well to print some extra copies of the bill, say one hundred, and I will submit the motion that one hundred extra copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The order to print the usual number will be made, and the motion to print the extra numbers will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SHERMAN. It might be done by unanimous consent in order to avoid delay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion can be entertained by unanimous consent without reference to a committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If we are to order the printing of any extra numbers, I suggest that we should order a thousand at least.

Mr. SHERMAN. There will be no time to distribute them among the country, and therefore a large number will not be needed; but we want more than one or two copies in examining a bill of this kind.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The members of the House of Representatives will want them. I think we should print a thousand, if we print any.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I will say five hundred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that five hundred copies of the bill just reported with the amendments of the Committee on Finance be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 289) to amend an act entitled "An act to facilitate communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electric telegraph," approved June 16, 1860, be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 205) authorizing the issue of patents for locations made with certificates granted under authority of the act of Congress approved March 17, 1862, allowing floats in satisfaction of lands sold by the United States within the limits of the Las Ormigas and La Nana grants in Louisiana, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 267) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 251) to organize a regiment of veteran volunteer engineers;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) relative to pay of staff officers of the Lieutenant General;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) relating to Green Clay Goodloe; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) providing for the election of a member of Congress for the State of Illinois by the State at large.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 17th instant the following acts:

An act (H. R. No. 185) to establish a postal money order system; and

An act (H. R. No. 370) to appoint certain officers of the Navy.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 205) authorizing the issue of patents for locations made with certificates granted under authority of the act of Congress approved March 17, 1862, allowing floats in satisfaction of lands sold by the United States within the limits of the Las Ormigas and La Nana grants in Louisiana, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. POWELL. I move to suspend all prior orders for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 320. It is a very short bill, that has passed the House of Representatives, and been reported upon favorably by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of this body. The sole object of it is to allow the construction of a bridge connecting the Louisville and Nashville railroad with that of the Jeffersonville and Indianapolis railroad across the Ohio river at the falls of the Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 320) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads, and for other purposes." It proposes to amend the act of Congress approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," so as to authorize the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and the Jeffersonville and Indianapolis Railroad Company, (stockholders in the Louisville Bridge Company,) to construct a railroad bridge over the Ohio river at the falls of the Ohio, subject to all the provisions of that act. The bridge may be constructed at a height not less than ten feet above high-water mark, and with three draws, sufficient to pass the largest boats navigating the Ohio river, one over the Indiana chute, one over the middle chute, and one over the canal; but the spans of the bridge are not to be less than three hundred feet, and the bridge and draws are to be so constructed as not to interrupt the navigation of the Ohio river.

Mr. WADE. I will inquire whether the bill provides that this bridge in height and span of arches, &c., shall conform to the other bridges that have been provided for over the Ohio river.

Mr. COLLAMER. This is an act to extend the one to which the gentleman alludes, the act passed last year for bridging the Ohio above the Little Sandy river. This bridge is to be built below there, at Louisville. In the first place, this bill adopts that law, but it provides that this particular bridge may be built with three draws. It is not expected to have it by a continuous span, and therefore the height does not become important. It is to be built at least ten feet above high-water mark, and the passage is to be in three draws, one over the main chute on the south side, one over the center chute, and one over the canal, and those are to be three hundred feet in the clear. How they are going to build them I do not know; but they say they can do it, and the bill provides that they shall be three hundred feet in the clear.

Mr. WADE. I believe that was the same in the other bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. No, sir. The other bridge was to be three hundred feet in the clear if they made a continuous arch, and the draw was to be two hundred feet on each side of that; but in this bridge the draw is to be three hundred feet in the clear.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the height?

Mr. WADE. The bill says ten feet above high-water mark.

Mr. COLLAMER. This is to be a drawbridge, and the height is a matter of no consequence if they will only build it high enough so that the water will not carry it off.

Mr. COWAN. I doubt whether the provisions in this bill have been well considered, particularly as to the height above the water. I suppose that under certain circumstances and going in certain directions there would be no difficulty; but under other circumstances there will be great detention, and I should think great danger. My recollection is that in the bill to which this is an amendment or supplement, it was provided that the bridges should be ninety feet above high-water mark.

Mr. WADE. Ninety feet above low water.

Mr. COWAN. It was at least sufficient to enable boats to run under it. This is at the falls, I understand, at a place where the water is exceedingly rapid, and where there will be great danger in the detention of heavy drafts; I do not mean heavy steamboats, but tow-boats with large cargoes in tow. For instance, there may be ten or twelve boats loaded each with fifteen or twenty thousand bushels of coal in tow of one of those boats, and if they are to stop there for the opening of a draw when the steamboat cannot go under the bridge, the navigation is obstructed. In order that this matter may be subjected to a little more examination, there being five or six hundred miles of this river above the place where this bridge is contemplated to be put, and all the people there very much interested in it, I move to postpone the bill until some day to give an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me, I will say that this bridge is to be constructed with three draws sufficient to pass the largest boats that navigate the Ohio river. The bill provides "that said bridge may be constructed at a height not less than ten feet above high-water mark." That, of course, will allow any tow-boat to pass under at high water. There is another provision in the bill that it shall not be constructed in such manner as to interrupt the navigation of the Ohio river. The bill has been very maturely considered by the committee of the House of Representatives, has passed the House of Representatives, and has received the mature consideration of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, and is reported with a recommendation that it pass.

Really I do not see any objection to the bill on the reasons stated by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. The three draws are to be such as to permit the largest boats to pass; and then it is to be ten feet above high-water mark, and that will allow every boat to pass except some of the flat-boats. If the Senator will notice that part of the bill he will see that the objections he makes are certainly provided against in the bill. Moreover, I will state that the larger number of boats that pass the falls have to go through the canal, where there are many locks to pass through. I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion. It is late in the session, and the companies are very anxious to construct this bridge and connect their roads.

Mr. COWAN. I am willing to do anything of course to accommodate gentlemen; but it strikes me at the moment, without having had an opportunity to think about the matter much, that this will be an effectual obstruction to the free navigation of the Ohio river. Boats from the upper part of the river are employed in towing, for instance, coals; a single steamboat will take in charge some twelve or fifteen barges loaded with coals, and when the river is high and they can go over the falls without going through the canal, this bridge will become an obstruction, because it will be utterly impossible for boats to pass under it, and this immense load will have to be stopped above the bridge until the draw is opened, and until they can go through; and I think all experience has taught that on rapid rivers these draws are subject to very great accidents, disasters, and dangers, so that in fact it will amount, to a great extent, to a material obstruction in the navigation. I therefore ask that the bill may be held over until I have an opportunity to inquire as to its working. If it is postponed until to-morrow I shall endeavor to ascertain what I can in regard to it.

Mr. COLLAMER. Before this is passed over I would call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and also of the Senator from Ohio, to the law passed in relation to the other Ohio bridges, prescribing the manner in which they were to be erected.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the date of the act the Senator is about to read?

Mr. COLLAMER. July 14, 1862. It provides—

"That any bridge erected under the privileges of this act may, at the option of the company or companies building the same, be built either as a drawbridge, with a pivot or other form of draw, or with unbroken and continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation than ninety feet above low-water mark over the channel of the said river; nor in any case less than forty feet above extreme high water, as understood at the point of location, measuring for such elevation to the bottom chord of the bridge; nor shall the span of such bridge, covering the main channel of the river, be less than three hundred feet in length, with also one of the next adjoining spans of not less than two hundred and twenty feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river as near as practicable: And provided also, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a drawbridge, the same shall be constructed with a span over the main channel of the river, as understood at the time of the erection of the bridge, of not less than three hundred feet in length, and said span shall not be less than seventy feet above low-water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge, and one of the next adjoining shall not be less than two hundred and twenty feet in length; and also that there shall be a pivot-draw constructed in every such bridge, at an accessible and navigable point, with spans of not less than one hundred feet in length, on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw."

This, it will be perceived, prescribed that the draw was not to be less than one hundred feet, whereas in the bill before us it is provided these draws shall not be less than three hundred feet.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was one hundred feet on each side of the pivot. Is this three hundred feet on each side of the pivot?

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no "pivot" mentioned here. It says they shall be three hundred feet clear. How they are going to build them I do not know; but that is the provision.

Mr. JOHNSON. "Not less than three hundred feet," this bill says. I doubt whether they mean that.

Mr. COWAN. The objection which strikes my mind is as to the height. If boats cannot pass under this bridge, of course they will be required to stop, and it is the stopping that is the mischief. The difficulty is to land boats above and detain them there until the draw is ready; and if they do not happen to make the landing, or if they cannot land, then they are driven down against the bridge only ten feet high, and there is a wreck of the whole concern.

As I said before, I have no special objection to making any improvement of this kind, but I desire it to be so made that the rights of the people above the desired location shall be preserved, and therefore I press my motion to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that question is put, I should like, if in order, to amend the eleventh line, and I ask the Senator to withdraw his motion so that I may move an amendment.

Mr. COWAN. Certainly, if the Senator will renew it again.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. I wish to move to amend the eleventh line by striking out the word "may" and inserting "shall." After a careful reading of the bill I am satisfied that the first proviso there, as now drafted, will not be imperative on the company, but will be discretionary. I do not think that was the design of the bill, but that would be the plain meaning of the language, in my judgment.

Mr. POWELL. I trust the Senate will not adopt that amendment. I do not think it will alter the meaning of the bill, but the effect of it will be to send the bill back to the House of Representatives. The language is now:

"Provided, however, That said bridge may be constructed at a height not less than ten feet above high-water mark, and with three draws, sufficient to pass the largest boats navigating the Ohio river."

The Senator proposes to strike out "may" and insert "shall." Surely they cannot construct it at a less height than ten feet above high-water mark if the word "may" be retained. It is a limitation.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Kentucky will read the bill as carefully as I have done he will find that it changes the meaning. The main part of this bill gives the bridge company the same privileges as are granted by the law which has been read by the Senator from Vermont; and if it stopped there, it would authorize them to build a bridge not exceeding ninety feet in height above low-water mark, with one span not exceeding three hundred feet. Then this proviso, which is not imperative upon the company but discretionary, says:

Provided, however, That said bridge may be constructed at a height not less than ten feet above high-water mark.

The difference between high and low-water mark at the falls near Louisville is very little. The rapidity of the current there, of course, makes the rise and fall of the water very much less than in the river at other places where the current is not so rapid. Consequently the bridge may not be more than forty feet above low-water mark; and this is a privilege given to the company; it is not imperative on them, it is simply discretionary with them; they may make the bridge with three spans instead of one. They are not required to do so, but allowed to do it.

The next proviso is, "And provided also, That the spans of said bridge shall not be less than three hundred feet." That is very different. The words have been carefully chosen. The first proviso is that the bridge "may" be constructed so and so, leaving it discretionary with the company. The next proviso is that the spans "shall" be not less than three hundred feet; and there is still another proviso, "that the said bridge and draws shall be so constructed as not to interrupt the navigation of the Ohio river." The framers of this bill have carefully worded it so as to allow the first proviso, which is the main one requiring three draws, to be simply discretionary with the company.

Mr. COLLAMER. The provision for three draws is not discretionary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it certainly is. The provision is:

"Provided, however, That said bridge may be constructed at a height not less than ten feet above high-water mark, and with three draws, sufficient to pass the largest boats navigating the Ohio river."

The only provision in the bill about the three draws is connected with the word "may," and is entirely discretionary. They may, under the provisions of this bill, construct a bridge with one draw, provided they do it under the terms of the old act.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not so understand it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that is not the meaning of the Senator, but I think it is the construction of the bill.

Mr. POWELL. I will state that it is not proposed to construct this bridge over the falls, but at a point above the falls, where it is rather dead water.

Mr. COWAN. Allow me to ask if the bill does not provide that it shall be directly over the falls; that one draw shall be over the Indiana chute, one over the middle chute, and one over the canal. The chutes are in the falls.

Mr. POWELL. The bridge is to connect the Jeffersonville railroad and the Louisville and Nashville railroad at Louisville and Jeffersonville above the falls; and so far from the river rising very little there, it rises forty feet at least, and it would be only a very extraordinary height of water when this bridge built as proposed would not be twenty or thirty feet above high water.

Mr. SHERMAN. The statement of the Senator from Kentucky must show the Senator from Vermont that it is necessary to look further into this bill. This bridge, according to the statement of the Senator from Kentucky, is not to be constructed over the falls; but who would read the bill without supposing that it was to be directly over the falls? Why talk about these spans being over certain chutes, which can only be in the falls? A chute, as I understand it, is where water is depressed and passes over the falls.

Mr. COWAN. The channel through the fall.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the bridge is to be constructed at Jeffersonville, two or three miles above the falls, there is no reason in the world why they should not construct it of the height described in the old act. The banks are not very high there. At any rate, the main point to be kept in view always is to preserve the navigation of the Ohio river, which is much more important than any mere bridge across the river. The act of last year was carefully guarded so as to preserve the navigation of the Ohio. But if they are to build this bridge only ten feet above high-water mark, that will only be fifty feet above low-water mark according to the statement of the Senator from Kentucky, because he says the rise above the falls is only forty feet.

Mr. POWELL. I said it was at least that. It may be a great deal over.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the falls of course the rise is much less. Above and below the falls it would be considerably more, but at the falls themselves, where the current is very rapid, the rise is not near so much. Probably fifteen or twenty feet will be the extreme rise of the water at the falls, perhaps not so much.

Mr. POWELL. I will state that these chutes mentioned here do not indicate that they are at the falls. They commence several miles above the falls, and the language of this bill "at the falls" does not mean that the bridge is to be across the falls, because the city of Louisville and the city of Jeffersonville are both above the falls, and this bridge is to connect these railways at that point.

Mr. COWAN. There is nothing in the bill which confines the bridge to Louisville or Jeffersonville either. The bill proposes "to authorize the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and the Jeffersonville and Indianapolis Railroad Company, (stockholders in the Louisville Bridge Company,) to construct a railroad bridge over the Ohio river at the falls of the Ohio," and that bridge is to be over the chutes in the falls. As was well remarked by the Senator from Ohio, the chutes are not above or below the falls. That which is technically denominated the "chute" is the available channel over the falls.

There is another reason why I think this bill should be postponed. It provides—"That said bridge may be constructed at a height not less than ten feet above high-water mark, and with three draws, sufficient to pass the largest boats navigating the Ohio river."

It is assumed that those draws are to be three hundred feet in width, and the honorable Senator from Vermont has stated that he does not know how the draws are to be made three hundred feet wide; and I will remark nobody else knows. It is an utter impossibility, I should think, to make draws of any width of that kind; but that is not the intention. The distinction is to be taken here between draws and spans. There is a provision afterwards "that the spans of said bridge shall not be less than three hundred feet;" but the draws may be of any width, as I take it, which would allow the largest boats navigating the Ohio river to pass through them. At any rate, I should be exceedingly sorry to leave that point doubtful; because every advantage is usually taken in the framing of these bills in order that the end desired by the parties in interest may be attained. I think that the bill should be carefully examined and so framed that there should be no doubt about its proper construction. If it is meant that spans and draws are identical, then there is no objection as to the width.

Mr. COLLAMER. There cannot be such a thing as a draw that is not as wide as the span.

Mr. POWELL. I used that word inadvertently, and said "span" instead of "draw." I did not intend to convey that idea.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that distinctly. There cannot be such a thing as a draw that is not as wide as the span. It cannot be made.

Mr. SHERMAN. It depends entirely upon the character of the draw. If the draw is a circular or "pivot draw," as it is called, which turns on an abutment, then, as a matter of course, the draw and span are the same; but if they build these draws like the draw of the long bridge at Washington city—a familiar case—the span may be wider than the draw.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is the same thing exactly; because the span, if you run it over and do not support it, falls down. The draw constitutes a part of the span itself.

Mr. COWAN. I do not see how it would be possible to construct a draw three hundred feet wide, because if it is a pivot draw, then each arm of the draw would be one hundred and fifty feet in length.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that could be done.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know how the weight of a heavy railroad train would be supported at the end of a lever one hundred and fifty feet long without anything to support it except the resistance which it would meet by pressing against the other end of the draw. But, as I understand the honorable Senator from Kentucky, it is not intended that "spans" and "draws" shall mean identically the same thing.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me, he is mistaken in that. I did not intend to express any opinion about it, for I do not know how wide these draws can be made. When I spoke of three hundred feet I intended to confine it to the span. I am wholly unacquainted how wide these draws can be made. I intended to apply the expression "three hundred feet" to the spans when I spoke first. I suppose draws can be made as wide as the spans. It is a matter about which I am not conversant and have no opinion.

Mr. COWAN. I hope that the bill will be postponed, so that we may have an opportunity of examining it more particularly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall" in the eleventh line of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the language of the bill secures what he desires, and I think is stronger than that which he proposes. It is now a proviso, a condition, a limitation; but when you use the word "shall" it will simply be a command. Unless the bridge can be built at that height it cannot be built at all, according to the language of the bill now. It is the same as if it read, "provided, said bridge can be constructed." That is the present meaning of the language, and I think the Senator will so agree when he considers that this language is used in a proviso which is intended to be a limitation upon the former provisions of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will say, a proviso may not only restrain the meaning of what precedes it, but it may extend it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is true.

Mr. SHERMAN. It may grant a privilege as well as be a restriction. Therefore this proviso simply grants the privilege to make three draws instead of one draw, not given in the original act. That is shown by the fact that in the next proviso, which is intended to be imperative, the word "shall" is carefully used just as I propose to use it in the first proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the bill by adding the following proviso:

And provided also, That the bridge shall be so constructed as to accommodate ordinary travel and transportation upon foot, and in carriages and wagons, at reasonable tolls.

I do not wish to embarrass this measure. It is a very important one to our State, as well as to the State of Kentucky and the commerce of the country generally; but I am aware of the fact that the southern part of Indiana, and I suppose a portion of the State of Kentucky, would desire to have a provision like this in the bill. Very many of these railroad bridges are so constructed as to accommodate the ordinary travel and business of the country; and I presume this amendment would not embarrass this enterprise. I have been addressed in regard to this matter by some of my constituents, and I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of the Senate, by this amendment, to the subject. If it is certainly intended to build a bridge so as to accommodate the ordinary travel and business of the country, I do not care about the amendment; but I think that ought to be secured.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not wish to interfere with this bill, but as I have had something to do with building bridges I will merely state that nobody has ever yet built a bridge with a span of three hundred feet in it in the clear. If it is to be a drawbridge, you have got to make it six hundred feet to put it on a pivot in order to get a clear of three hundred feet. The thing never was done and never can be done; and if the bill passes with that provision in it it will not be worth a cent.

Mr. COLLAMER. This bill came over to us from the House of Representatives and was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I read the bill and understood it according to its common acceptance, that it required the draws to be three hundred feet long. I sent for the gentleman who had charge of the bill, the Representative from that district, Mr. MALLORY, and pointed it out to him, suggesting that it was inconceivable to me how they could make a draw three hundred feet long; that I thought his bill if passed in that shape would be impracticable. He said that he was unacquainted with engineering and did not know anything about it, but he was going home and he would see Mr. Guthrie, who is the main man in this enterprise, and would telegraph me from Louisville in relation to it. I waited but did not get any telegram. He has since returned and has informed me that Mr. Guthrie said they could do it. "Very well," said I, "then I will report the bill as it is." I supposed the draws were to be three hundred feet clear. If it does not effect that purpose in that way, I did not understand the bill.

Mr. COWAN. I propose an amendment which will settle that point. In the fifteenth line, after the word "spans," I move to insert the words "and draws," so that it will read:

And provided also, That the spans and draws of said bridge shall not be less than three hundred feet.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I do not want to see this measure destroyed, and I do not suppose the Senate is going to undertake to decide upon the architecture of a bridge. I am not competent to decide anything of that sort; I do not know whether other Senators are or not. A general provision that the navigation of the Ohio river shall not be interfered with is certainly sufficient to accommodate the interests that the Senator from Pennsylvania represents. I think a draw of that length is impossible; but it is a question in architecture that I do not understand. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will say, as an architect, that it is practicable, there will be some force in his proposition; but I believe the Senator himself has said that it is impracticable; so that the adoption of this amendment will be equivalent to a defeat of the measure.

Mr. COLLAMER. Evidently upon the reading of the bill we are to understand that it is to be three hundred feet clear between the abutments; that there is to be a space three hundred feet wide with nothing to impede the passage of a boat. If it does not mean that it was misunderstood.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think it means that.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to say another thing. I should be unwilling to approve of a bill providing for a bridge across the Ohio river that did not have some clear, definite description of what the draws were to be in width. If this bill does not fix it at three hundred feet, I misunderstood it. I would not support a bill which I supposed left the width of the draws uncertain.

Mr. GRIMES. My excuse for saying anything in regard to this bill is the fact that a large portion of the commerce of the State which I in part represent passes down the Ohio river. We are in the habit in our section of buying iron, nails, and such heavy articles, in the spring, at Pittsburg and Wheeling, and bringing them down the Ohio over these falls when the river is in such a condition that it can be passed without undergoing the necessity of passing through the canal. I desire to know from the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, who reported this bill, whether that committee have been able to satisfy themselves that by allowing a bridge to be constructed over the falls, even if the span is to be three hundred feet wide, they will not very materially obstruct the navigation of that river at the high stage of water in the Ohio?

I can tell the Senate that we have had on the Mississippi river somewhat of a demonstration as to the effect of a bridge in a stream where the water is the swiftest, and that is at the Rock Island bridge. A bridge has been constructed across the Mississippi river at the bottom of the Rock Island rapids. The draw, I think, is two hundred and seventy feet. Putting in the piers on each side of the draw of course necessarily obstructs the channel of the water, and accelerates the speed with which it passes through the draw. The man, therefore, who stands at the helm of a steamboat or who has charge of a raft cannot calculate the velocity of the water; he cannot calculate the eddy that is created by these two currents coming together through the draw, and the result is that we have disasters there very frequently. The river men on the Mississippi are in a constant turmoil in relation to that bridge, and complaints come up to us, and suits are instituted in the courts every few weeks for damages that they allege they sustain in consequence of those disasters to their commerce and to their vessels.

I desire to be satisfied, before I vote for this bill, from the investigations the committee have made, that allowing these companies to make these draws at three hundred feet apart will not so accelerate the speed of the water between the piers as to materially affect the commerce of the river. I want to throw no obstruction in the way of railroads passing over. I think they might be constructed so as to facilitate the general commerce of the country; but of all the places in the world where the construction of a bridge would be of the most risk to the commerce of the nation it would be where the water is the swiftest, either above the falls or below the falls; but I understand that this is to be over the chutes through the falls, and according to the construction that the Senator from Pennsylvania puts upon it, he says that the bill provides for it. If that is so, I want to understand it.

Mr. POWELL. Upon the reading of this bill I do not know whether it is the intention to make these draws three hundred feet or not. The spans are to be not less than three hundred feet. The bill is very specific. It provides that the draws shall be sufficient to pass the largest boats navigating the Ohio river. I do not know, I am not bridge-builder enough to know, whether you can make a draw three hundred feet. I do not know how wide they can be made. But this bill seems to me to provide sufficiently against the obstruction of the navigation of the Ohio river. Certainly it is clear that the draws are to be wide enough to pass the largest boats that navigate the river. Then there is another provision in the bill that the bridge shall not obstruct the navigation of the river. I cannot tell which of the Senators is right about the building of a drawbridge. I hope, however, that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will not prevail; for if it should be impossible to make a draw three hundred feet, that provision will defeat the object of the bill. I really see no necessity for making these draws three hundred feet. The spans have to be three hundred feet. In my judgment, that disposes of the objection about obstructing the water and preventing navigation, as indicated by the Senator from Iowa. If the draws are sufficiently wide to pass the largest vessels navigating the river, that is all that is wanted, in my judgment.

Mr. COWAN. When the question was before the Senate on the passage of the original act allowing bridges across the Ohio river, there was a large amount of testimony taken before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and it was established there to the satisfaction of that committee that the business of the Ohio river required that the space spanned by the bridge between its piers should be left three hundred feet wide.

Mr. HOWARD. I rise to a question of order. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HOWARD. I was about to make that suggestion.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before calling up the unfinished business the Chair desires to state a matter of practice and inadvertence into which the Chair fell, for the purpose of correcting the action of the Chair. The Chair on Monday last appointed a committee of conference on the consular bill, and passed it to the Clerk upon a slip of paper, not having it announced in the Senate. Afterwards the Chair changed one member of the committee; but the committee had been announced to the House of Representatives. The Chair is satisfied that he ought not to have changed that member of the committee after it had been announced to the House, and desires, if there be no objection on the part of any Senator, to correct the mistake, and restore the committee as it was. If no objection be made, that correction will be made on the Journal, and the committee restored as it stood originally.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that subject is dismissed, I should like to inquire whether the Journal of that day should not in some way be changed so that it will be made to correspond with the Journal of the House of Representatives, though possibly the change the Chair proposes may accomplish that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal had not been read to the Senate before the change was made. The Journal was read after the change was made, so that there was no mistake in the Journal.

Mr. SUMNER. So I understand; but the point is this, if the Chair will give me its attention. A message was sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives communicating the fact that the President pro tempore had appointed Messrs. SHERMAN, SUMNER, and MORGAN as conferees on the part of the Senate on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. I understand that that message was actually received by the House of Representatives. It must, therefore, be on the Journals of the House. Shortly after there came another message from the Senate announcing the substitution of Mr. COWAN for Mr. MORGAN. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate is, whether our Journal, which I have in my hand, for Monday, May 16, 1864, should not contain a precise record of that transaction precisely as it occurred, to wit: the first appointment of Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. SUMNER, and Mr. MORGAN, and the communication of that appointment by message to the other House; and secondly, the substitution by the Chair of Mr. COWAN for Mr. MORGAN, Mr. MORGAN not having resigned, and the communication of that substitution by a special message to the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will contain what is done to-day undoubtedly, that Mr. MORGAN was restored or substituted, and the House of Representatives will be so informed.

Mr. SUMNER. But still the point remains whether the Journal for that day, May 16, 1864, should not be amended according to the facts. To bring the point—it is an important question of privilege—before the Senate, I will move that the Journal of Monday, May 16, 1864, be amended according to the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator to move to amend the Journal of Monday last, so as to say that Mr. COWAN was substituted for Mr. MORGAN on that committee of conference.

Mr. SUMNER. So that it shall appear how the committee was first constituted; that that committee was communicated by message to the other House; that then the substitution took place; and that substitution was communicated by message to the other House. Without such an alteration, I submit to the Chair, the Journals of the two bodies will not harmonize.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will direct the Journal to be so amended unless there be objection. The Chair hears no objection. The special order is now before the Senate.

GOODS IN WAREHOUSE.

Mr. CONNESS. With the consent of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad whom I have consulted, and the Senate, I desire to call up a bill reported by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] this morning, which is now on the Secretary's desk. It will excite no discussion, and will occupy but a moment of time. It is important to act upon it at once, so that it may go to the other House for action there.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 282) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes," approved February 29, 1864, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that all goods, wares, and merchandise in public stores or bonded warehouses on the 1st of May, 1864, on which the duties at that time were unpaid and which had then been in bond for more than one year but less than three years, may be entered for consumption and the bonds canceled at any time before the 1st of September next, on the payment of duties and charges according to law.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not exactly understand the effect of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state for the information of the Senator—I expected the Senator from Pennsylvania to do it, as he reported the bill—that it relates to goods that were in bond during an interregnum created by the act that we passed at this session in relation to the release of goods from bond. We passed an act providing that goods might be withdrawn between March and September. This bill is to allow and permit goods to which that act did not apply, which were in bond for two months previous to that time, the year having expired, also to be withdrawn from bond and entered for consumption and sale, and the duties paid. Otherwise, their owners will be forced to export them from the country.

Mr. COWAN. I will say by way of explanation that by the act of the 14th of July, 1862, it was provided that goods in public store or bonded warehouse might be withdrawn for exportation within three years from the date of original importation, and for consumption within one year on payment of duties. On the 29th of February, 1864, an act amendatory of the former law was passed; and that provided that goods which had been in bond more than one year, (and, of course, not allowed to be withdrawn for consumption before that time,) and less than three years, might be withdrawn for consumption on payment of duties at any time before the 1st of September, 1864. It will be observed that the import of that act was to allow all goods then in bond to be withdrawn for consumption. Those that had been less than one year in bond might of course be withdrawn under the old law, and those which by the old law had been forbidden as having been in bond more than one year were released from that prohibition under this act and allowed to be withdrawn. But intelligence of the passage of the act did not reach California until about the middle of April, perhaps nearer the end of April. Owing to that fact there was a class of goods that did not fall within the provisions of the act of the 29th of February last, and those were goods which had been imported between the 1st of March and the last of April, or between the 29th of February, the date of the passage of the act and the time when intelligence of its passage reached California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask whether that class of goods could not have been withdrawn under the original act?

Mr. COWAN. No, sir; they could not.

Mr. JOHNSON. They had been bonded less than a year. Did the last act repeal the first?

Mr. COWAN. No, sir, it allowed it to remain, and that was the difficulty. If the last act had expressed specifically that all goods might be withdrawn from bond for consumption, there would have been no difficulty; but it was passed on the supposition that all those which had been in bond for less than a year would, of course, be allowed to be withdrawn, and that all those which had been in bond for less than three years would have to be provided for.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think I make myself understood by the Senator. Did the first act, which authorized goods that had not been in bond more than one year to be withdrawn, apply only to goods then in bond at the date of the passage of that act?

Mr. COWAN. The act of the 14th of July, 1862, is a general act, not repealed by the act of February 29, 1864.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does that apply to all goods at all times in bond not exceeding a year?

Mr. COWAN. Prior to the passage of that act.

Mr. JOHNSON. To those in bond prior only?

Mr. COWAN. Prior only; and the object of this bill is to provide for the goods imported for the two months ending the last of April.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state, in addition to what the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has said, that there are goods also in the same condition at some of our eastern ports, and the Treasury Department have recommended the passage of this bill. They find it necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the bill read once more.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. The 1st of September named in the bill is the period at which the act passed in February fixed the time that the withdrawal shall cease.

Mr. SHERMAN. The point I wish to get at is whether the words "according to law" in the bill mean that the duties shall be paid according to the law at this day or according to the law on the 1st of May last.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to know whether, under the operation of the bill as now framed, these persons will have to pay the additional duty of fifty per cent. provided for the other day.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only doubt grows out of the words at the close of the bill, "according to law." Does that mean according to the law in existence at the time of the passage of the bill, or at the time the goods are withdrawn and entered for consumption?

Mr. COWAN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CONNESS. None at all.

Mr. HALE. The difficulty suggested by the Senator from Ohio occurred to me. I think the statute is uncertain in its present phraseology.

Mr. CONNESS. The fifty per cent. additional tax is now the law of the land. This bill will be the law after it has passed both Houses and been signed by the President. Of course goods withdrawn when it shall have passed, according to its provisions, will pay the tax required by law.

Mr. HALE. Please state what is the object of the act, if that is the construction.

Mr. CONNESS. That has been stated three or four times, I will say to the Senator, and I do not desire to consume too much of the time of the Senate. The purpose is to allow persons who have goods in bond to withdraw them for consumption and sale, and to enable them to pay us the increased duty now imposed by law rather than to compel them to export them from the country.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt that the explanation made by the Senator from California is made according to his view of this bill, and it may be right. I am not sure it is not right; but it strikes me as possible, and indeed probable, that a different construction may be put upon it if it shall be passed in its present form. I rather incline to think that the law to which the bill refers as the law to regulate the payment of duties and charges, will be construed to be the law in force on the 1st of May; and if so, these goods, if they are not subject to the increased duty imposed by the resolution passed some days since, will not have to pay what all other imported goods pay. I propose, therefore, to add after the words "according to law," the words "now in force."

Mr. CONNESS. There is one objection to that. Suppose Congress see fit to increase the duties between now and September, as they may, then the parties withdrawing these goods before September would pay a less duty than others would be compelled to pay according to law. That is the only difficulty.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I will modify the amendment by saying "according to the laws in force at the time the goods shall be withdrawn."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

TERRITORY OF MONTANA.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 15) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows, namely:

That the first amendment of the Senate to the said bill be amended to read as follows, namely:

Amend section five by striking out in lines one, two, three, and four, the following words: "that every free white male inhabitant, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been an actual resident of said Territory for thirty days prior to the first election," and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

All citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become such, and who are otherwise described and qualified under the fifth section of the act of Congress providing for a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho approved March 3, 1863;" and in line five of said section after the word "said" insert the word "first."

That the Senate recede from its second amendment to the said bill, and that the Senate recede from its third amendment to the said bill.

LOT M. MORRILL,
CHAS. R. BUCKALEW,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
E. H. WEBSTER,
W. S. HOLMAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know the nature of that substitute for our amendment, if the Senator from Maine will be good enough to state it.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state in a word that the effect of the amendment of the committee of conference is to authorize the temporary organization of the government of Montana by that class of persons that were authorized to organize the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. SUMNER. What class of persons was that?

Mr. MORRILL. They were, as I recollect the qualification, white citizens of the United States, and such others as had declared their intention to become citizens. As it now stands, the qualification in Montana will be that the voters at the first election will be citizens of the United States, and such as have declared their intention to be citizens of the United States, and such as are qualified by the fifth section of the act organizing the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. SUMNER. That is, free white persons, I understand.

Mr. MORRILL. That is what it comes to. I will read the section of the act in relation to Idaho, and then the Senator will judge for himself:

"Every free white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years, who shall be an actual resident of said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within the said Territory; but the qualifications of voters and of holding office, at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly."

The Senator will remember, perhaps, that the difference between the two Houses was this: the House of Representatives allowed all free white male inhabitants, who had been resident in the Territory perhaps ninety days, to vote in the organization of the Territory; by the Senate amendment it was restricted to citizens of the United States—a restriction in that sense, but an enlargement on the question of color, allowing any citizens, whether colored or not. That was the disagreement; and upon that question both parties receded and agreed upon a new proposition, as I have stated.

Mr. SUMNER. Is not the new proposition almost identical with the original House proposition on the question of color?

Mr. MORRILL. On the question of the exclusion of colored men it is identical. It does exclude colored men.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that the point of difference between the two Houses was simply as to the word "white" or "black."

Mr. MORRILL. That was the principal question, and on that point I desire to say precisely how the committee found the question. It will be seen that the whole provision for the qualification relates to the temporary organization of the Territory. When it is temporarily organized, which is to be at once, in the contemplation of the bill, as the necessities of the times demand it, the whole question of suffrage is left to the Territory; so that the question of suffrage as presented to us applies entirely to the temporary organization of the Territory; and the committee became satisfied that the question presented was this practical question, whether it was advisable to organize the Territory at the present time. If it were necessary to organize it, we became satisfied that this difference between the two Houses must be overcome in some such way as this; and the committee, believing there was no practical importance in the Senate amendment, as there was believed to be no colored person in the Territory, and probably would not be any colored persons actually resident in the Territory who, by any possibility, could vote on this occasion, did not see that it was worth while to make a question on what the honorable Senator from Massachusetts perhaps might regard as a principle, when, by no possibility, could it affect the question practically. For these reasons the committee agreed substantially on the bill as it passed the House of Representatives. One other amendment was as to the time of holding the first session of the Legislature, that it should not exceed ninety days; and the remaining one was immaterial.

Mr. SUMNER. Then the proposition, as I understand it, is that the Senate shall abandon its position. Why so? Because the House of Representatives will not abandon its position.

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir, the Senator will allow me; because there did not seem to be any practical sense in adhering to it; because to adhere to it defeated the bill; because to adhere to it accomplished no earthly purpose; gave nobody any right.

Mr. SUMNER. For the other House to adhere on the other side defeated the bill also.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes.

Mr. SUMNER. And the question is which shall adhere, the side that is right or the side that is wrong?

Mr. MORRILL. And that is the question the committee submit to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will adhere to its original position, and I believe that the statement of that principle at this moment is more important than the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I will ask the Senator whether there is not such a principle as this in legislation and parliamentary law: where two branches equally desiring to accomplish an object, and the object is considered to be a good one, find themselves at loggerheads, and one branch is the innovating party, as the Senate was in this case, making the amendment, and one party or the other must recede, as a matter of parliamentary law or comity is it not the duty of the party proposing the amendment to recede rather than have the bill fail? The Senate committee found itself in that attitude. The House of Representatives had proposed in this case precisely what the Congress of the United States sanctioned last year in the organization of the very Territory a portion of which we now propose to call Montana. The House and Senate met in conference, the House said, "We have done precisely in this bill what you gave your assent to last year; the bill fails unless you consent to do now what you conceded by your action last year to be proper then, and there is no change of circumstances which authorizes the Senate to change its ground." In that view of the case, and the Senator will allow me to say, believing that it affected no man's rights whatever, that if we agreed to this it would not affect the right of any colored man in that Territory, it ceased, in the judgment of the committee, to be a practical question; and therefore, in view of the principle I have already stated, that the party proposing what was impracticable was in duty bound to show it to be practicable or to back down, it seemed to the committee, on the whole, better to advise the Senate that it is no longer practicable; so, sacrificing no principle, we advise the Senate to recede and agree with the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARLAN. I shall vote against the report of the committee, chiefly, however, because I do not think there is a pressing necessity for the organization of another Territory in that part of our domain. The population is not large, embracing the whole Territory of Idaho as now organized. I do not, therefore, think there is a sufficient necessity for the passage of the bill to justify Senators in departing from what they may regard as a principle. For myself I take this view of that subject; if the bill should become a law as it left the Senate, it could not be consistently construed into a vote in favor of negro suffrage. The bill as it left the Senate declares that all male citizens of the United States over the age of twenty-one years shall be entitled to the right to vote. The Supreme Court has declared that persons of African descent, the descendants of slaves, are not citizens of the United States in such a sense as to be able to bring a suit in a court of the United States. I admit very frankly that I do not think the decision of the Supreme Court in that case was right; but it nevertheless was a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; hence, if the bill should become a law with the phraseology that it contained when it left the Senate, those who voted for it could not be considered to have voted in favor of negro suffrage. I do not then think that voting for or against the report of this committee can be considered as a vote that would affect that principle one way or the other; and as I do not think there is a pressing necessity for the organization of a new Territory to be called Montana, I shall vote against the report of the committee, with the expectation that if a majority of the Senate shall so vote the bill will fail, and the whole subject go over until the next session of Congress.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WADE. I was on the committee that reported this bill for the erection of two Territories out of that portion of the country now called Idaho, and I thought of course that it was somewhat important that it should be done at this session. There is great inconvenience in the Territory, as it now stands, in transacting business throughout the whole of it. I suppose it is known to the Senate that that Territory is divided by an almost impassable mountain. It does not divide it exactly in the middle, but sufficiently so to show that a very large Territory can be erected on each side; and the population is divided into nearly equal parts by that natural barrier, there being about as many on one side as on the other. The bill was presented here with the old form that had grown into a custom in the days of negrophobia, when it prevailed to the highest extent here, and the word "white" was inserted everywhere wherever there was any chance to insert it, in order to discriminate between white and black. I was always opposed in principle to that, and I do not propose now to depart from my principle. I have no concealments to make on this subject or upon any other. I am opposed to this discrimination between white and black in voting. I do not think it forms an intelligible line of demarcation. Some black men are infinitely more capable of voting intelligently than a great many whites, and vice versa. The color of a man, whether black or white, is no criterion, and I will never consent to make it a criterion of voting. I think that in a republican form of government like ours a man has a right to vote, an inalienable right to vote; although I know that that principle is combated here by some. I believe that the right to participate in the Government under which we live is as sacred and as much a natural right as any other; and I believe that no other rights that belong to man can long be maintained when he is deprived of this; and therefore, sir, I go right straight to the work when there is any occasion for it, and I should have said nothing now on this subject only that the vote I intend to give here might be construed to be a vote by me against the principle that I have now avowed.

I never legislate or act in reference to mere shadows. Gentlemen may call them principle or not principle. I look to the effect of a measure when my vote is required. I cannot be bluffed off by the mere form or shadow of a thing. What is this? When I agreed to the original bill it had the word "white" in it, and I so reported it. I did not like it; but when I came to consider that it was the mere shadow of a shade, that it would not affect the rights of anybody, I did not care to make a controversy over it. I did not care to compel gentlemen to vote upon that question when I saw difficulties in the way. I had much rather it had passed there, and I did not care which, because the effect of it would be just nothing at all. There are no negroes in the Territory. It is not pretended that there is a black man in this whole Territory. Why then should we detain the Senate here in fixing a principle that can have no application whatever? It is a bare abstraction as it stands, I do not care in what form of words it is; but I give gentlemen notice whenever this question shall be raised in such sort as to affect the rights of any men, I shall take the broad principle of right and stand by it as firmly as anybody else. But when the principle is invoked in a case where it can have no effect, I am not going to be biased by it; nor am I going to be prevented from effecting a good purpose because I am told that I violate the ghost of some principle.

I think it is right that the Territory should be organized. I believe it will be for the welfare of the people there to organize it now. If I did not think so I should not have agreed to the report of the original bill. That being fixed in my mind,

I am not to be deterred from accomplishing that purpose because gentlemen tell me that they have a principle here that will affect nobody's rights. I am for the right; I will get it at every time I can; but I am not very tender-footed about what is called a principle unless it affects somebody. That is no principle that affects the rights of nobody. That is an abstraction, and I do not legislate on abstractions.

Now, what is this? It is admitted that there is no negro in the Territory. No black man has any right to vote there now. This right of voting once exercised, without a black man being present, is to be gone forever, and then this principle is to be transferred to other hands and put out of your reach entirely. Those into whose hands it then goes will do just as they please about it. Then why should we stand here contending about that which, as I said before, is a mere abstraction? I think the rights of the people require that this Territory should be organized. As to do so in the mode proposed will trench on the rights of no individual, I shall vote for this report, giving notice, as I said before, that when the question which is supposed to be here involved comes up properly, you will find me as straight upon it perhaps as any other man.

Mr. HALE. If there is anything in this principle, I differ entirely with my honorable friend from Ohio in this particular: if you want to assert a principle that you believe in, it is vastly more easy practically to assert it in reference to a wilderness where there is not a man, than in reference to a mixed people consisting of the various classes that would be affected by your legislation. The wisdom and the foresight of the men of 1787 that affixed the great anti-slavery ordinance to the Northwestern Territory was practically manifested, because they took a virgin soil that was free from the contentions that would be introduced by various races, and said that the coming generations as they came to people it should people it under certain restrictions and regulations.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to correct him. The whole of the Northwestern Territory at that time was a slaveholding country. There were hundreds and hundreds of negroes, slaves, held by French settlers wherever there were settlements in that Territory; at Vincennes, and various other places on the Ohio and Illinois, and on the lakes. It was a slaveholding country.

Mr. HALE. Practically it was a wilderness. I know that there were here and there remnants of a French population that held slaves, but practically it was a wilderness. It was only dotted here and there with a few settlements. Although what the Senator says may be literally true, and unquestionably is, yet so far as regards the great mass, the great extent of the Territory, it was a wilderness, and the ordinance was a rule applied to fix its condition for coming generations. So it was in Oregon when we organized a territorial government there. I presume that there were no negroes there at that time. That was in 1848. I remember well the contest we had over that bill organizing the Territory of Oregon. Did we not stay here week after week and month after month from sunset to sunrise upon this question. The South agreed that slavery might be prohibited in that Territory; the Senate and the House of Representatives were both agreed to that extent; but for a saving clause they wanted to put in this proviso "it being north of 36° 30'." That was a mere abstraction; everybody knew that it was north of 36° 30'; but the southern statesmen contended that that should be put in as a reason for the legislation. We refused to do it, and we sat here until one Sunday morning late in August, and finally we passed the bill after one of the most severe contests that ever took place in this country. And here let me say that if the United States had stood right where they placed themselves on that morning of August, 1848, prohibiting slavery in that Territory and refusing to say that the prohibition was because it was north of 36° 30', we should have had no compromise in 1850, no rebellion in 1861, but everybody would have been satisfied.

Now, sir, here is a Territory which is practically a wilderness. There may be some settlements there, but very few. The policy that we incorporate by this bill will be the policy that will probably govern them for ages. If we give them a clean charter to begin with they will live under it. If we give them a different one, they will live under that. I am not pledging myself, nor do I mean to pledge myself, as to how I shall vote on any other bill. I am not certain; I am not entirely clear in my own mind—

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to put a practical question to him on this point.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator is aware, I presume, that this Territory has a government now, the government of Idaho, and that no colored man is allowed to vote there under the charter of that Territory; so that it changes nothing.

Mr. HALE. I do not exactly see that there is force enough in that objection to require me to occupy the time of the Senate in answering it. The facts, undoubtedly, are as stated. I will let that go. But I was going to say that I would not pledge myself as to how I should vote on all the bills that may come up. I think that in this District it presents a very different question from that presented in the present case; and as I am not very anxious to have this Territory organized, I think I shall vote against the report of the committee; and if it should result in the disaster of defeating the bill, I think there is only one class of men who will suffer by it, and I admit that they will suffer, and they are the disappointed candidates for offices under the organization of Idaho. They did not all get offices when that Territory was organized; there were not offices enough to give them all; and after the thing was over, and the successful men had got their ends answered by being appointed Governor, judges, marshal, &c., another lot remained to be disposed of. What was to be done with them? They were here; they came on to be Governor and judges and marshal, &c., and it suggested itself to them that the best thing on earth would be to divide and make another Territory. Now, suppose you do divide and make this new Territory of Montana, can you satisfy them? No, sir, there will be another lot, and then, as the Senator from California suggests, you will have to divide again. That class can be provided for by a private bill. If the public good does not absolutely require that this Territory shall be organized, any equitable claim that they may have for the patriotic services they have already rendered and are ready to render, can be disposed of in a private bill; and I shall vote against concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Let me say another thing. I almost always listen to my honorable friend from Maine with profound pleasure and admiration. When he is really in earnest, when his heart and his voice and his judgment and his impulses are all in unison, all sympathetic on the same chord, he thunders his convictions out so that I have sometimes been afraid of the windows over our heads being broken by the concussion. [Laughter.] But, sir, it was not so to-day. The Senator spoke well, but not loud enough to disturb the atmosphere, hardly loud enough to be heard on this side of the House; from which I gather that he may be moved by tender consideration for those unfortunate gentlemen who are waiting for these offices rather than by any firm conviction of the principle that is involved. I think that no great public calamity will result if this bill goes over, and so thinking, I shall vote against concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. MORRILL. Exactly on that point I want to appeal to the Senator to know precisely where he stands. If he intends to vote against this report of the committee on the ground that there is no public necessity for the organization of the proposed Territory, I submit that that is not an open question. That was not the question of disagreement between the two Houses. The committee did not understand that there was any such question. The two Houses, by the passage of this bill by an overwhelming majority, have foreclosed that question; Congress has adjudged that the public necessities require the organization of this Territory. The committees of both branches so reported, and both Houses have foreclosed the question by deciding that it is in harmony with the public interests that this Territory be organized. The only question presented by the report of the committee of conference is, is it proper to organize it in this way? That is all that is open by the report of the committee. If I had entertained any scruples upon the question presented by the honorable Senator, upon which I think he intends to cast his vote, and if I understand his intimation he intends to dodge the other question—

Mr. WILKINSON. Where there are any practical results to follow.

Mr. MORRILL. He does not intend from the intimation he has given us to be committed on the other question. I want to know whether he means to "face the music" like a brave Senator, and whether he means to vote against this bill because the report of the committee of conference is improper. The Congress of the United States having adjudged that it is a political necessity of the times to organize this Territory, that there is a community of men out there engaged in mining, and that they demand a government and ought to have it, I want to put it to the honorable Senator whether he is willing in a playful way to put this whole question aside and say, "I vote against it on the ground that there is no public necessity for it, but I am not quite willing to say whether I would so vote on account of the negro being in or out." That is the question before the Senate, and on that my honorable friend, who is usually so frank and always so outspoken, seems inclined to reserve himself for a spirited play upon me.

I have said, and I think I need not repeat, that in regard to this question of negro suffrage I never voted to disfranchise a man on account of his color. Do I propose it here? Does this committee of conference propose to disfranchise any man on account of his color? By no possibility whatever, for the reason that there is no colored man in this Territory, not one, and we had no ground to believe that up to the time when the community there would be called upon to act on this question there would be such a man there. I do not propose, therefore, to disfranchise anybody, and upon that question of color I repeat now that I never did and I never expect to disfranchise a man on account of his color; and I am ready to say what the Senator from New Hampshire I understand has not quite made up his mind to say, has not, it seems, quite summoned up his judgment, got up his courage to say, that I will meet that question which is practical here in the District of Columbia. He intimates very distinctly that on that question he is a little weak, he is a little doubtful, he is a little uncertain whether it will not do to disfranchise a man here even on account of his color, and he proposes to dodge the question where it is impracticable by resorting to a point that is foreclosed against him by the judgment of both Houses of Congress.

If this bill is to be voted down, I insist upon it that it shall be voted down on the report of the committee, and on the points involved in the report, and not on others; and on the question in the District of Columbia, about which the Senator has so many forebodings, "I will meet him at Philippi," and I will see if he will dodge that when it comes up. I am in favor of putting the elective franchise on some general principle upon which we can stand, and ought to stand, other than that of color, and I notify him that I am prepared to meet that question when it comes in a practical form, as it will come when it arises in regard to the District of Columbia, and I shall then invoke him and appeal to him to act in accordance with the convictions of his whole life, and not to give us to understand in advance of that great question that he intends to dodge it or to get around it.

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator is mistaken in one respect in saying that I should vote on any different ground from that which is presented in the report. I said that I should vote against the report, and if the result should be so and so I should not mourn over it. Now, Mr. President, I confess that the honorable Senator from Maine—and he knows as well as anybody can that there is no one who has a more profound respect for his talents and for his character than I have, and what I am going to say now of course will not offend him, because if it reproves him I say it "more in sorrow than in anger"—but I confess that the Senator from Maine was the last man on this floor from whom I expected to hear the old Whig doctrine that was thundered out here on the Wilmot proviso and repeated again: "What was it? When it was proposed during the Mexican war to affix an eternal anti-slavery ordinance upon all the territory that we should acquire, what was the answer of Mr. Webster, what was the answer of the politicians of that school, what was the answer of the trading politicians of both parties? It was that it was unnecessary, that there were no slaves there, that they could not go there. Nay, sir, Mr. Webster, in his great zeal, said that it was written by the law of God on the face of the country that no slaves could go there, and he did not want to reenact the law of God, and would not insult the understanding by proposing it, because there was not a colored man there. That was the very reason that made the measure practical and wise. It was the reason that demanded it. It was a virgin territory, uncontaminated by the foot of a slave, just as it came from the hand of the Almighty, the home where the children of His love were to find rest and peace, and where by culture they were to earn their daily bread; and it was the part of wisdom, of piety, and of patriotism to consecrate it to the great purposes of free government and of freedom, so that the coming generations as they came successively upon the stage of being might find their residence there uncontaminated and unhindered by the introduction of slavery upon that soil. Just exactly what the country presented at that time that called for the Wilnot proviso does this Territory of Montana present now. It is uncontaminated by the foot of a slave; and we ask that when this General Government first propose to give it a local government, it shall not by this edict educate the people who are to go there to an inhuman and unchristian prejudice.

Gentlemen say it is not practical. Why, sir, it is the most practical measure before the country. It is eminently practical, and it can be carried out without injuring the property of anybody. Upon this subject I stand committed; but I said, and I say again, that I am not going to commit myself to the future. I do not know but that coming events may throw new lights on these questions. It is sufficient for me that I meet each question as it comes, with the light which God gives me. Years ago, when a seat in Congress looked to me infinitely more valuable than it does now, I sacrificed my place in Congress and my connection with my political party to follow out a conviction which I entertained on this subject. I may do the same thing again.

But, Mr. President, I stand now where I stood then. I saw the slave power ruling this country, and ruling it with a rod of iron. They ruled New Hampshire no less than South Carolina, through the organism of the Democratic party. The first time I ever had a seat on the floor of Congress in the other House some twenty years ago, I was told as a flattering compliment from some of "our southern brethren" that they looked upon New Hampshire as the South Carolina of the North. That was the way the country was ruled; but when they proposed to devote all the energies of this nation not only to the fostering and the sustentation and the perpetuity and the eternity of human bondage, but when they sought to violate treaties, to make unjust war, to reach robber hands to steal other territory solely for the purpose of extending and perpetuating slavery, I then broke with the party that I had belonged to, and they broke with me, and it is an unsettled question whether they turned me out or I turned them out, [laughter,] but we got apart, anyhow. Whenever my convictions or my fancies, or whatever they may be, shall call me to take a course different from that of the party with which I am associated—though I am an old man now and I was a young man then—it will not cost me half the effort to sacrifice myself now that it did then.

But, sir, I am wandering from the subject. I do not wish to pledge myself to the future; but on this subject I am perfectly clear. I am clear on principle; I am clear on expediency; I am clear on every consideration that can address itself to me except a sort of kind consideration that I should have for the disappointment of those who are waiting to fill these offices. Let not the Senator reproach me that the main question in regard to this bill is settled. Mr. President, it sometimes happens that when it is supposed an issue is closed by the craft of man, it is opened again by the providence of God. Those who think they have closed this matter up and have got the judgment of both Houses of Congress that this new government shall be established, by a disagreement between themselves cannot settle it, and thus Providence presents the question anew to us; and does the Senator mean to say that we shall not meet it? As well might the Senator tell me that if I had been robbed on the highway by parties who had got my property and were quarreling about how they should dispose of it, I could not retake it; that if owing to a difficulty between the captors they did not know exactly how to dispose of it, the rightful owner had no power over the question again; it was settled. It may be settled in form. In spirit, in fact, in truth it is open, because, as the Senator from Maine himself at first well said, if the Senate did not recede, the bill was gone. Then I propose to let the bill go, by not receding; and that is a legitimate way, a fair way; but I will not occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. NESMITH. I trust the Senate will not concur with the Senator from New Hampshire, and allow the bill to be lost on a mere abstraction. It is very well understood that there are no negroes in the Territory of Montana, and even if there were there is no parallel between the amendment proposed to the present bill and the great principle involved in the ordinance of 1787, which we have heard from the Senator from New Hampshire was made perpetual. The bill itself permits the first Legislature to fix the terms of suffrage of inhabitants there, and the probability is that they will determine the question as it has been determined by the committee of conference. At most, even if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WILKINSON] should be insisted on and concurred in by the House of Representatives, the system provided for by it probably would not last more than six months in the Territory.

I have no particular sentimentality on this subject so far as the negro is concerned; but I do take some interest in the white men who are there. There are probably to-day in the Territory of Idaho (of which Montana is a part, and which is proposed to be divided by this bill) about sixty thousand white persons, most of them adults. The census taken by the marshal last October showed that there were then thirty-four thousand people there; and, judging from the emigration which has since gone there from both sides of the continent, I am of opinion that there are sixty or seventy thousand people there to-day. The object to be accomplished by the division is not, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, to procure offices for certain individuals who are there or who are here, though that will probably be one result; but the object is to give good government to sixty or seventy thousand of our people who are now in the Rocky mountains, and who are entirely destitute and deprived of government by reason of the present condition and organization of the Territory. The Territory of Idaho is peculiarly situated. The western portion of it is susceptible of settlement; and there are rich mines there, there are heavy settlements there now. The seat of government is on the immediate western border of the Territory, which is more than a thousand miles in extent from east to west. The Rocky mountains range near the center and so divide the Territory as to leave an intervening space of three or four hundred miles without any settlement. Then there are large settlements in the eastern portions. The consequence is that the western settlements and the eastern settlements are divided by an intervening district of mountainous country of nearly four hundred miles, which for at least one half of the year is practically impassable. I say, then, that on whichever side of the mountain you place the seat of government you divide the people almost equally by this almost impassable barrier; and I think it is to the interest of the white men there, of the men who are citizens there and who are miners there, that this division should be made.

I believe, furthermore, that the division will be for the interest of the Government. You propose to levy a tax on the mining business of that country. It will be difficult, with the seat of government in one end of the Territory a thousand miles from the other extreme, to enforce your law, to have your courts organized, and to take the proper steps which will be essential for the securing and collection of the Government revenue in that vast district. The Territory to-day is about five or six times as large as the State of New York, to say nothing about the natural obstacles which prevent communication between the eastern and western portions of it; and as I stated before, for the interest of the white men who are there now, and are without government, I am in favor of the passage of the bill. I should have cared but little whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota prevailed or not, as I knew it could possibly have no practical effect there. Before a negro would ever be there to vote, the Legislature would have met and would have changed the qualification of voters as fixed by this bill, and have probably confined the exercise of the elective franchise to white men. These are the reasons which induce me to vote for the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not rise to occupy the Senate on the subject of this bill further than to say that I shall vote for the report of the committee with a great deal of pleasure. I think we are merely spending time uselessly in protracting a discussion on a subject of that kind, and I give notice that at the earliest possible moment I shall again call up my Pacific railroad bill for the purpose of passing that. It is now the special order of the day, and all of this discussion has been really a consumption of time which belonged to that far more important bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will allow us to take the vote on this report.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly. I merely made the suggestion for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Oregon seems to have misunderstood the ordinance for the organization of the Northwest Territory. If he looks to that, he will find that that contained no discrimination of color. I have it before me.

Mr. NESMITH. Will the Senator excuse me? I did not speak of it in reference to that. I spoke of the ordinance of 1787 as a perpetual ordinance and beyond the power of any territorial Legislature to repeal, change, or modify. I spoke of the pending bill, which defines the qualifications of voters in the proposed Territory, as one which was within the control of the Legislature of the Territory, and therefore I said there was no analogy. I said nothing about the ordinance having any reference to color.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I misunderstood the Senator entirely; but as I have the ordinance in my hand, I will call the attention of the Senate to the clause applicable to this subject:

"So soon as there shall be five thousand free male inhabitants of full age in the district, upon giving proof thereof to the Governor they shall receive authority, with time and place, to elect representatives from their counties or townships to represent them in the General Assembly, &c."

It will be observed, therefore, that in this ordinance to which we so often refer as a commanding authority there is no discrimination of color. Now I ask if this is not a good precedent? It was applicable to a vast unsettled Territory, precisely like the present bill. Senators may say that our fathers in the ordinance were not practical. I am not of that number. Senators may say that our fathers in the Declaration of Independence were not practical. I am not of that number. Senators may say that our fathers in the Constitution of the United States, which contains no discrimination of color, were not practical. I am not of that number. Sir, I believe that the authors of this ordinance and also the authors of the Declaration of Independence, and of the Constitution of the United States, were eminently practical when they excluded from all of those instruments any discrimination of color. But it is said that there are no persons in the new Territory to whom this principle is now applicable. This can make no difference. It is something to declare a principle, and I have no hesitation in saying that at this moment the principle is much more important than the bill. The bill may be postponed; but the principle must not be postponed.

Mr. MORRILL. I will suggest to the Senator if he will permit me—[Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.]—that the statement I made about its applicability was this: it is not by possibility applicable to any man of African descent. There are some five or six thousand Indians to whom a bill in general phrase without limitation of "white" might possibly apply; I do not say that it would apply to them in this case.

Mr. SUMNER. Still the whole subject-matter of this clause is not Indians, but it is the well-known African race of this continent; and it is proposed by special words, wrapped up in a clause borrowed from another bill, to exclude them from the right of suffrage in this Territory; and the whole argument for this injustice, as my friend from New Hampshire has so ably stated, is only a reproduction of that well-known ancient argument for slavery in the Territories. How often were we in those days compelled to encounter the charge that we were not practical, that we were urging a prohibition when there was no occasion for it. For myself, I believe you cannot too often assert a prohibition of slavery, nor too often assert human rights wherever they may be called in question; and especially do I believe in the importance of such assertion when you are laying the foundations of a new community. "Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined." Those are familiar words of our childhood. Does my friend from Maine wish that the tree that he plants shall grow up with a generous and protecting shelter for all mankind, or that it shall be the bent and crabbed product of unhappy prejudices generated by slavery? I know my friend means no such thing; but I do insist that the policy that he now recommends tends to this fatal end. For myself, sir, I am satisfied with the Declaration of Independence. I am satisfied with the Constitution of the United States on this important subject; and on this question and on all kindred questions I adopt the language of our lieutenant general in the field, "I will fight on this line to the end, even if it takes all summer." There is no line which is better than that of human rights. While fighting on that line I cannot err. There is no pertinacity which can be too great. There is no ardor which is not respectable. I thank General Grant for these words. They express his own steadfast purpose; and we all thank him. But each in his sphere may make them his own. I make them mine wherever human rights are in question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is very seldom, as the Senate and the country know, that I speak on a subject of this character, and therefore I apologize for saying a word on the present occasion. I think we have had enough of the negro to-day for all the members of the Senate who wish to transact the legitimate business of the public. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to. The question being taken by yeas and nays upon concurring in the report of the committee of conference, resulted—yeas 26, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wiley—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sprague, Sumner, and Wilson—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Fessenden, Hicks, Howe, McDougall, Richardson, Riddle, Sherman, and Wright—10.

So the report was concurred in.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 195) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th June, 1865, reported that the committee of conference, having met, after full and free conference had been unable to agree.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 195) disagreed to by the House of Representatives, insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the seventh and eighth amendments of the Senate to the said bill, and ask a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. COLLAMER, Mr. GRIMES, and Mr. NESMITH.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] was excused by the Senate from service upon the Committee on Finance, and if it is the pleasure of the Senate I should like to have the vote reconsidered and then let it lie over, and I will explain my reasons at another time.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator's motion is entered I hope it will not be acted on now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I will enter the motion and let it pass over, and I will explain to the Senate hereafter my reasons for moving the reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 132) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. TRUMBULL to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out in the first section, lines thirty-two to thirty-six, the following words:

And two thousand shares shall be the greatest amount which any one person may hereafter subscribe for or hold at any time, or for which certificates of shares shall in any case be issued or recognized by said company.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to make a formal amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the chairman getting through with his formal amendments before mine is acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois withdraws his amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. On page thirty-two, line fifty-four, of section thirteen, I move to strike out the words "of which this is an amendment," and change the word "the" into "this" before "act," so that it will read:

The said Kansas company shall complete and equip not less than one hundred miles of its said railroad and telegraph within two years from the time of filing their assent to the provisions of this act, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now renew my amendment to strike out in the first section, line thirty-two, after the word "act" the words, "and two thousand shares shall be the greatest amount which any one person may hereafter subscribe for or hold at any time, or for which certificates of shares shall in any case be issued or recognized by said company." The object of the amendment is to get rid of the limitation. The bill limits the amount of stock to be held by any one person to $200,000. I suppose it will be difficult to get the capital stock of this road taken at any rate; and if it is taken at all, as I hope and trust it will be, the railroads of the country already organized will probably be the principal stockholders; but if you limit them to subscribing only $200,000 I apprehend it will be an obstacle in the way of getting the stock taken, and I have made the motion, therefore, to strike out that limitation. I have no special objection if the Senator from Michigan, the chairman of the committee, is desirous of having some limitation, to put in a higher limitation, though I think it will be quite as well to strike it out entirely, for I do not think there is any danger of any one person monopolizing the whole stock of this company. Still, if a limitation is necessary, I think the amount should be extended.

Mr. HOWARD. The theory upon which the limitation rests is that there is a danger of the accumulation of too large an amount of the stock of this company in the hands of one man or in the hands of a few men, and that it may thus become an immense corporation governed entirely by private interest and become obnoxious of very serious and weighty popular objections. I understand from the conversations which I have had with very intelligent men connected with this enterprise and who are as anxious to prosecute it as any of us are, that this restriction embodied in the present bill is in their judgment a sound and salutary one. The object of it is to prevent too large an accumulation of this stock in the hands of one person or a few persons. I do not know but that $200,000 is too small a sum, and I should be quite willing to have the amount enlarged to $1,000,000, so as to restrict the quantity which any one individual can hold to $1,000,000, not allowing him to hold more; and I shall offer that as an amendment in case this amendment be rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois; but if that amendment should not succeed, I should of course prefer that the limitation should be increased as suggested by the chairman of the committee; but I think it is better to strike out the limitation altogether. This is a very herculean enterprise, and it will require capitalists known to be capitalists to carry it out successfully. Personally, looking to the interests of the country, I would not care if the road was made by one individual or half a dozen individuals, for just in proportion as may be the ability of a few stockholders will be the security which the United States will have that they will not lose by what they propose to do in favor of the enterprise themselves.

Mr. POMEROY. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to another clause in this bill. If the motion of the Senator from Illinois prevails it will affect the residue of the section, particularly this clause, beginning in line fifty:

The said company, by its directors or its stockholders, shall, from and after the passage of this act, make assessment upon all the stockholders of not less than five dollars per share, at intervals of not less than six months, &c.

The bill obliges the company to assess once in six months five dollars on every share. Now, if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois prevails, and it is left open for one company or one individual to take the whole stock, they will have entire control of that question whether they will assess themselves every six months or not, and the Senator must see that this amendment affects that portion of the section.

Mr. HOWARD. The effect will be to throw the control of the company entirely into the hands of a few heavy stockholders. I hope that this amendment will not be adopted. I think we had better try it for at least one year under this limitation; and if we find that it does not work properly, it can be easily amended at the next session of Congress. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOWARD. If it be in order, I move to amend the amendment. I suppose that can be done by the consent of the mover.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator that this is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I was going to suggest that it might be so amended as to allow any person to hold ten thousand shares; to make the limitation $1,000,000 instead of $200,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If this motion should not carry, that can still be done. My impression is that it is better to strike the limitation out altogether. I think there can be no danger of any one person monopolizing the capital stock of this great enterprise. But if there be I would enlarge the limitation. We can take the vote first on striking it out altogether, and if that fails we can insert some other sum. I am not particular about striking it entirely out; I am willing to fix some sum; I think it should be a larger sum than $200,000 where there is so large a capital stock as this. I do not think there is the least danger in the world in allowing the thing to be open, and letting any one take as much stock as he pleases.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not concur with the Senator from Illinois in this respect. I think there is danger of this stock passing into the hands of a very few persons who will abuse their powers and privileges very much to the public prejudice and to the prejudice of individuals. For instance, if this amendment prevails, what will the consequence be? It will be in the power of the stockholders, and of the directors elected by them, either to impose or to withhold assessments as they may see fit. It will be in the power of one man who holds a controlling interest in the stock to embarrass the company and prevent the imposition of assessments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that were desired, and any one person had money enough to control such an enterprise as this, it would be very easy to do it through third parties: his clerks and his friends would take the stock. It is true the limitation would furnish an obstacle in the way of doing it, but it would be so easily avoided that it seems hardly worth while to impose such a limitation.

The question being put on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 6, noes 10; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have the vote again. I think there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again.

The question being again put, there were, on a division—ayes 10, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is not too late, as the vote seems to be an index of the feeling of the Senate, I will withdraw my amendment and move to insert a different limitation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be withdrawn by unanimous consent; but still the vote shows no quorum voting, and no business can be done.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My object was to avoid the difficulty. Having withdrawn the motion, I supposed no record would be made of it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. That will show whether we have a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Dixon, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Johnson, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wade—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sumner, and Wilkinson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Harding, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Riddle, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will be necessary to strike out the words in the sixty-second line on the 4th page, and down to the close of the sixty-third line, to conform to the amendment just made. The words proposed to be stricken out are, "not however to exceed in amount to any one person the above limitation of two thousand shares."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. Will it be in order now to move another sum, for instance ten thousand shares? It seems to me advisable that there should be some limitation. My reason for it is precisely this: we are all familiar with the way in which railroads are taken by banking-houses even in our own country, but constantly for many years in Europe. If a Government wishes to raise, say $20,000,000, or twice that sum, it does it through a single banker. The great house of Rothschild, which has representatives in every capital of Europe, at any day could take this whole road. Then we need not go to a house like Rothschild, the enormous wealth of which is perfectly well known, but take a great many other large banking-houses of Europe; take the banking-house which does the largest amount of American business, the house of Barings & Co. It was only yesterday I was reading a sketch of the life of the recent head of that house, who died, and it was stated that the first great operation which brought him as a banker before the public was his supplying very promptly twenty-eight million francs to the French Government after the battle of Waterloo. In the year 1818, at a sudden contingency, he very promptly supplied that large sum, twenty-eight million francs, which would be between five and six million dollars. I refer to that as an illustration of the capacity of these large houses to deal with large sums, and I submit it as a practical question whether we shall leave our bill in such a condition that one or more of them may take up the whole stock. I do not know that it is advisable to put any restriction upon them, but the committee that reported the bill started with the idea that there should be a restriction, and I understood that the Senator from Illinois even thought that a restriction to the amount of $1,000,000 would not be out of the way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think there will be no practical difficulty about that. I have no particular objection to having it fixed at $1,000,000; but I thought it as well to leave out the limitation. I do not think there is any sort of danger of anybody monopolizing this road. I suppose the difficulty will be to get the stock taken.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not considered the question of danger. I rather assumed that the committee had looked into that matter, that they thought it was important that there should be a restriction of some kind or other, and the question was as to the extent of that restriction. The extent of that restriction is to be determined by the experience of history in such cases of business; and we know that the large banking-houses of the world almost at a moment's warning may bring together large sums so as to take up the debt for a corporation or stock to almost any amount. I would propose the amount of ten thousand shares or $1,000,000 as a limitation.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator's amendment would be a restoration of the clause stricken out with this simple alteration, that the words "two thousand shares" should be changed to "ten thousand shares."

Mr. CONNESS. The Senate has just by a vote stricken out the language that is proposed to be reinserted; and I therefore suggest that the preferable course would be to reconsider the last vote, and then substitute the amount now proposed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no trouble about that. This is a different proposition. We have struck out certain words, and now the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to insert not the identical words stricken out—that would not be in order—but the words stricken out with a material alteration, changing "two thousand" to "ten thousand," which is entirely a different proposition.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the great mistake the Senate has committed was in adopting the amendment of the Senator from Illinois; but it may be remedied perhaps in some degree by now adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. Nobody pretends that any one man is going to invest $100,000,000 in the capital of this company; nobody has got that money to invest; but we have created a perfect monopoly by the bill as it stands now, and allowed anybody to subscribe $100,000,000. The directors who are named in this company, I do not know who they are, and those who may get control of it may subscribe in the name of five or six men, enough to constitute the board of directors, the whole amount of capital, say $100,000,000. They may not propose to invest a dollar in it themselves, but to employ themselves during the next few months, or the length of time that may be allowed by the law, in making negotiations, sub-selling the stock to Tom, Dick, and Harry in this country and in Europe, and whatever they may be able to sell they will of course make a large profit upon. Thus you may put into the hands of men who may not pay in one dollar the entire control of your Pacific Railroad Company.

The argument which the Senator from Illinois urged in favor of the adoption of his amendment was that various railroad companies would want to invest in the stock of this company. The answer to that is that none of those railroad companies can invest in it unless they have a special act of the Legislature authorizing them to do so, and if they do invest they can invest in the name of the directors of the company, in trust for the benefit of the company of which they are directors. That is done every day now by railroad companies. There are railroads built in the Senator's own State and in mine in which railroad companies in New York and Michigan and the East are very heavily interested, not ostensibly in the name of the companies, but through the directors and agents of the companies who hold stock in trust for the benefit of the companies of which they are directors or agents. Why not let that be done in this case? I think—I am not authorized to move it because I voted against the proposition—that the proposition of the Senator from Illinois ought to be reconsidered, and we ought to limit this amount so that it shall not exceed $200,000 in any one person.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to amend the amendment in section one, line thirty-two, by inserting after the word "act" the following words:

And ten thousand shares shall be the greatest amount which any one person may hereafter subscribe for or hold at any time, or for which certificates of shares shall in any case be issued or recognized by said company.

Mr. SUMNER. I am inclined to think that the Senator from Iowa proposes too great a restriction when he proposes $200,000.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not propose anything. I am going to vote for your amendment if I cannot get anything better.

Mr. SUMNER. But the Senator argues in favor of a restriction of $200,000. It seems to me that that is too great a restriction.

Mr. GRIMES. Suppose that under the Senator's amendment one hundred persons should subscribe a million each: there is the whole of the stock taken. I do not know how many directors you have got; but it would be very easy for the directors and their immediate friends to obtain the entire control of the road if they are allowed to subscribe a million each.

Mr. SUMNER. At the suggestion of friends, the motion being entirely within my own power, I will change "ten" to "five," so that it will read:

And five thousand shares shall be the greatest amount which any one person may hereafter subscribe for or hold at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to call the attention of Senators to one provision in this same section. In order to prevent any person subscribing for a very large amount, it provides that he shall pay when he subscribes ten per cent. of his subscription, and in the second place it provides that he shall be assessed five per cent. every six months until the whole of the capital stock is paid in. This is a new provision, one that I never saw before in any charter for any incorporation. The subject of assessing the stock is always left in the hands of the board of directors, and they assess it at their pleasure. They assess more, or they assess less, or they do not assess at all and build the road on the bonds; but this amendment obliges the board to assess five per cent. every six months until the whole par value of the stock is paid in. If that proviso is allowed to remain, I desire to have the word "shall" changed to "may," so that the board of directors may do it, not that they shall do it; because if you say they shall do it they have got no discretion about it, and they must assess this amount, whether they want the money or not.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator that it would be useless to insert the word "may," because they may do it without putting that in.

Mr. POMEROY. Then strike out the whole clause; but to oblige the board to assess five per cent. every six months until the whole par value of the stock is paid in is a provision unheard of before this.

Mr. CONNESS. That is not the question now.

Mr. POMEROY. I know that is not the question now before the Senate; but that is a reason why, as the bill now stands, nobody will subscribe for any large amount of this stock.

Mr. COLLAMER. The objection that I understand to arise to this measure without this limitation is that a few men may subscribe the whole amount of stock, if we fix no limitation, and obtain control of this road. It is said there is no danger of their having control, because ten per cent. on the capital stock is to be paid in when they subscribe; but if they obtain possession of the road, it is a matter entirely within their control as to what they will pay that ten per cent. in. They may give their notes in their own way, as they will have control of it, or take their money back again after they have paid it in. Whenever you allow a few men to obtain control in that way, the provision requiring the payment of ten per cent. of the subscription is no check upon them, because that is as much in their control as the rest of it. It seems to me, therefore, there should be some limitation as to the amount allowed to be subscribed by any one person.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the Senator from Vermont is mistaken in regard to that. The bill provides that a certain amount must be paid in, and we have Government directors, according to the terms of the bill, to see that the provisions of the law are executed.

Mr. COLLAMER. We do not have a majority of the directors.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We do not have a majority, but we have directors whose duty it is to report to the Government. I am not for legislating upon the principle that everybody is dishonest and corrupt. I suppose we want to pass a bill that the capitalists of the country will be willing to take hold of and invest their capital in the construction of this road. What we desire is the construction of the Pacific railroad. The Senator from Iowa says that the railroad companies already organized and in existence, through whose influence this great work is to be constructed, as I think, in a great measure may evade this provision of the law; that even if you allow $200,000 worth of stock to be taken by one person, they may get different directors or trustees to take it in their name, and in that way subscribe for as much as they please. I am never for passing a law that shall hold out an inducement to anybody to evade it in that way. This is an unusual provision to put in a charter of this kind, so far as I am advised; a very unusual provision. It is enough to cry out "monopoly," but where is the danger of a monopoly here?

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MAY 20, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 148.

I am opposed to granting, by Congress, any privileges to this company that will extend further than is necessary to secure the completion of this work. All that Congress proposes to do is to do enough, and only enough, to induce capitalists to build this Pacific railway. We shall be indebted to them when they do that. We want to hold out an inducement to them to take hold of this work, and not throw obstacles in the way of men who have means to build the work. We do not want to treat the men whom we are asking to invest their money in this enterprise as if they were dishonest men, as if they desired to get control of the road and not comply with the law, but to treat everybody fairly. I see no occasion for the limitation; I do not think there is the least necessity for it; but if there is this danger of dishonest men getting hold of the stock of the company and controlling it, if they are dishonest enough to do that, do not the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Iowa know that it will be the easiest thing in the world for the same person who is disposed to do this, if it can be done without a limitation, to do it with a limitation by acting through other parties in the very way suggested by the Senator from Iowa, that the railroad companies are to take stock in this road, not in their own names, but through directors and trustees? They would have to multiply and make the directors and trustees a little more numerous if you limit it to $200,000 than if you limit it to $1,000,000. I think there would be no great difficulty with this limitation of $1,000,000. If the Senator from Massachusetts is disposed to leave it at $1,000,000 I shall be satisfied with it and willing to agree to his amendment, but I hope the Senate will not reduce the limitation to $500,000.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Illinois misapprehends what I said in regard to the subscription to the stock of this company by railroad companies other than the company that is to be incorporated here. His argument was, as I understood him when he first addressed the Senate, that this road was to be measurably, if not to a very great extent, built by other railroad corporations. All I have to say in answer to that, and all I intended to say before, was that his proposition does not change that. The law that creates those other corporations in the other States controls those corporations. As a general thing they have no authority to invest their money outside of the State the jurisdiction of which contains their franchise. If they do, they must do it in the name of trustees or in the name of directors who hold the trust for the benefit of their corporation. Then all the difference it would make between the Senator's proposition allowing an unlimited sway to these other companies to come in and hold this stock and the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts would be that they would be compelled to hold in the name of two or three different trustees, instead of holding in the name of only one trustee. If that is all the convenience that is going to result to these outside corporations and to the country by permitting them to build this road, had we not better avoid even the appearance of creating a monopoly? I confess that in the way it stands now with the amendment of the Senator from Illinois as the action of the Senate, it has the appearance—I do not say that that was the intention of the Senator or the intention of the Senate; I know it was not —of being the most stupendous monopoly that was ever devised on this continent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me ask the Senator from Illinois if he ever knew a railroad to be incorporated in any State in the Union that had this limitation.

Mr. COLLAMER. This very provision was in the old law for the incorporation of the Pacific Railroad Company that we passed two years ago.

Mr. HOWARD. This clause is copied from the law of 1862.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My question was whether there had ever been any incorporation in any State with this limitation.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Vermont have answered that question sufficiently; but as the Senator and I are both Yankees by birth, allow me to ask him if he ever knew of a corporation that was created that was to have such beneficent advantages and prerogatives and privileges conferred upon it as this Pacific Railroad Company? Why, sir, you are putting your hands into the Treasury of the United States and bestowing upon this corporation most lavishly. There is no analogy, therefore, between this case and the case of railroad corporations created within the States. The idea of giving to one man or any ten men this great boon—I do not know how many millions; $90,000,000, I believe, under the provisions of the bill as it now stands—does, I confess, strike me as most monstrous.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I do not wish such a misapprehension to go out as that Congress is proposing to give $90,000,000 to anybody. Here is a great enterprise of national importance. The country has been demanding for years the construction of a railroad across the continent. It is a great desideratum to obtain it. All parties have been for a Pacific railroad. This bill does not propose to give $90,000,000 to anybody. It holds out inducements to capitalists to build this road. I will go with the Senator from Iowa in favor of giving a less inducement, if that will accomplish the object. All we want is to obtain the construction of this road. That is what is of national importance. That is the view we should take of it. We wish to enrich nobody.

Sir, this is not an ordinary enterprise. The Senator says large inducements are held out. Why, sir, it is a great undertaking. It is for the building of a railroad for thousands of miles through a wilderness country and over mountains, where, unless there is some inducement held out, capitalists will not be likely to construct the road. All that we propose to do is to hold out such an inducement as will lead to the construction of the road; and this is not proposed to be a gift. There is a large donation of lands connected with the road; but the propositions of this bill are to guaranty the payment of the interest upon the bonds of the company.

Mr. GRIMES. What difference is that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The company is bound to refund it, is it not?

Mr. GRIMES. The interest?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The interest we pay and interest upon that interest. That is the provision of this bill, except as to the first year's interest. It is not proposed to give $90,000,000 to anybody. The proposition is simply that when the men who shall undertake to construct this work issue their bonds, if they do not meet the interest upon those bonds the Government of the United States will pay the interest upon them for twenty years, holding a lien upon the road and everything connected with it for reimbursement of the interest which we pay, and interest upon the interest from the time that we pay it. I should be sorry to have it understood by the country, in the language of the Senator from Iowa, that we are proposing to create a monopoly and giving $90,000,000 to anybody.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Iowa perhaps is not aware that we reserve by this bill the authority to repeal or modify this charter at any time; and if the work is not done according to the views of the Government of the United States, if it turns out to be a bad enterprise, if it proves to be defective in its machinery, if any of its provisions is found to be mischievous in any way, it can be altered by Congress, the general right being reserved not only to modify but to repeal.

When the honorable member from Iowa speaks of this being a monopoly which may redound with great wealth to those who may embark in this business, he ventures an opinion that perhaps the result may not realize. It is a great enterprise. It is great certainly in one particular: it is great in the hazards which are run by those who may embark in it. It has always seemed to me that the United States would be much more secure against losing anything by what they propose to do in having this company in the hands of admitted capitalists. The richer the stockholder is the greater the security of the United States. If the stock is divided into small sums, and five hundred, or one thousand, or two thousand people are interested in it, the security of the Government will be comparatively little. In point of fact, if the road is to be made and it shall result in what its friends suppose it will, advantageously, no loss to the Government can possibly accrue. All that they propose to do by this bill is to guaranty the interest on these bonds a certain length of time, and if they should be compelled under that guarantee to pay the amount of the interest, they have a right to be refunded not only the amount of the interest which they may pay, but interest upon that interest from the time they make the payment.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Maryland has told us that there is a provision in this bill which allows Congress to alter, amend, or repeal it. I suppose that that may be a valuable provision in some incorporating act; but I apprehend it will not be a very material one here, so far as the consideration of this question is concerned.

Let it not be understood that I am opposed to the Pacific railroad. I am in favor of it, and represent a constituency that is probably more interested in it than the constituency of any man here. But what I fear is, that if we do not have a limitation as to the amount of stock that shall be taken by individuals, it will all fall into the hands of a few men who will hold on to it until the time limited for the prosecution of the work, with a view of selling it at a profit to themselves. If they do not succeed in selling it they will abandon the charter to the United States; if they can succeed in selling it, then whatever they sell for is a profit to them. That is what I want to guard against; and I am satisfied that more money can be secured under the proposition of the committee than under any other that can be offered; but as the proposition of the committee has been voted down, I am ready to accept that of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The idea seems to be entertained by the Senator from Maryland, and by some other gentlemen, that it will be with great difficulty that men can be induced to take stock in this company, that a company can be organized. I think the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad will bear testimony to the truth of what I say when I say that there are three organizations, each of them embracing men of prominence and of commercial and financial standing in the country, seeking to get the control of this grant, each of whom is determined, or professes to be determined, to push it forward with the same amount of zeal and energy. There is no trouble on that score. The question now is, as I apprehend, whether we will put the whole thing into the hands of a few men at the risk of losing it, or whether we will place a limit upon the stock and not trust to the power of Congress hereafter to amend the charter or repeal it entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Let the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The Secretary read it; in section one, line thirty-two, after the word "act" to insert:

And five thousand shares shall be the greatest amount which any one person may hereafter subscribe for or hold at any time, or for which certificates of shares shall in any case be issued or recognized by said company.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the bill as originally drawn was proper, and the more I think of it the better I am satisfied that the limitation of $200,000 was a proper and necessary limitation; but I will not now protract the discussion on that subject. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts limiting the amount which any one person may hold to $500,000. I believe we ought to have some limit. I believe it is necessary in order to protect the property and the utility of the company itself. I do not believe in placing in the hands of any man, or enabling any man to accumulate in his own hands, such a vast amount of stock as he would be enabled to do under the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. In short, I do not believe in making this an immense moneyed corporation and giving it practically the influence, the odious influence, of a moneyed monopoly, which would be the ultimate result of the doctrine insisted upon here by the Senator from Illinois, of allowing any man to subscribe to any amount he may see fit in the capital stock.

I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate longer. I hope the amendment will be adopted. If it shall be, then it will be necessary to restore the amendment which was made by the Senator from Illinois in a subsequent portion of the section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. It will now be necessary to make another amendment in the same section, in line sixty-two, after the word "issued" to insert, "not, however, to exceed in amount to any one person the above limitation of five thousand shares."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be altered so as to be made consistent with itself, and the change suggested by the Senator from Michigan will be made.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to another provision in this same section providing that books shall be opened in various cities, eight or nine in number, and that they shall remain open until all the stock is subscribed for. I will suggest whether there should not be some limit as to the time. Suppose they are open for six months, and the stock is not taken?

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose that that is a matter which may be very safely intrusted to the care and management of the board of directors. It is merely administrative business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill does not leave it to them.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; it does.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not see any provision there compelling them to keep them open.

Mr. POMEROY. I will not offer an amendment to it; but I think we ought to make an amendment in the fiftieth line of the substitute. That clause now reads:

The said company, by its directors or its stockholders, shall, from and after the passage of this act, make assessments upon all the stockholders of not less than five dollars per share, at intervals of not less than six months from and after the passage of this act, until the par value of all shares subscribed for shall be fully paid up.

It occurs to me that that is an unusual provision, and I think it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. HOWARD. In regard to that, as has been very properly remarked by Senators, the object of this bill is to insure the construction of the Pacific railroad, and if the railroad is to be built some reliance at least must be placed upon those persons who become stockholders in the company; they must necessarily contribute their fair share toward paying the expenses of the work. The United States is doing a great deal to aid and assist the company by way of issuing its credit in the form of a guarantee; but it does not follow by any means that the stockholders are to be released from their duty of contributing in the form of assessments as assessments may be necessary. There has thus far been not one dollar expended on the part of this company in the actual construction of the work. I believe that not a spade has been struck into the ground anywhere

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir, in California.

Mr. HOWARD. I mean on the main line.

Mr. CONNESS. California is on the main line.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; California is not on the main line. Not a pick has been struck in the earth between the initial point in the East and the termination of the main line at the West. It all remains to be done. I do not know how much money has been contributed by the present stockholders, but sure it is that they have done nothing thus far in the form of constructing the road; I mean the Union Pacific railroad.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They have commenced at Omaha.

Mr. HOWARD. That is not on the main line. The main line commences at the one hundredth degree of west longitude, and terminates at the western boundary of Nevada. The others are called branches.

Mr. POMEROY. I will remind the Senator that the Union Pacific railroad are to construct the road from Omaha. It is their work and nobody else's.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the Senator dislikes this provision which compels the board of directors or the stockholders of the company to make assessments at the rate of ten dollars a year upon the stock. That would require a person who should hold one share of the stock to pay it up in full in the course of ten years, paying at the rate of ten dollars a year, five dollars every six months. It seems to me that that is not an unreasonable requisition to be made upon the stockholders. It is inserted here to bring home to their consciences and their consciousness that there is a duty due from them to the company and to the Government, that they are to contribute of their own money, that this work is to be carried on by them earnestly, devotedly, at their own expense, and that "Uncle Sam" is not the ultimate party to foot all the bills. It seems to me that if you strike out this clause thus requiring assessments to be made, you in fact destroy the utility of this bill. You release them from an obligation which under this bill they would at all times feel in the form of paying their money. I do not wish to see more moonshine stock in circulation. I wish to see something substantial and satisfactory.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to remind the Senator that this company has been organized, and organized in good faith, and money paid in and the work commenced. I know myself that $2,000,000 were subscribed and ten per cent. paid in. A large amount of iron has been purchased and the work is under way. I never knew of any way of subscribing for stock such as some Senators have represented—of paying in your money and then taking it back again. I do not think that a board of directors, organized as it is to be organized under this bill, and with Government directors who have no interest in it, could stand up in daylight and allow any such transaction as that.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will allow me one word; in order to guard against that he will see that the bill provides in the same clause that "money only shall be received for any such assessment, or for any portion of such capital stock." There can be no legendism of converting bills of exchange and promissory notes into payment for stock; it must be money.

Mr. POMEROY. The practical way of building railroads in this country has always been to pay assessments on the stock to a certain amount to begin with; but there never has been a company organized yet that I ever knew of, especially in building our roads in the West, where they have been obliged to pay in the full amount of the par value of their stock. It is arranged in this way: the company assess, for instance, forty per cent. After that has been assessed and paid they issue bonds, and the bonds are taken by the stockholders in proportion to the amount of stock they own and paid for, and the stock and the bonds go together. The stock of this railroad company and its bonds belong together; they will go together, excepting the bonds the interest of which has been guaranteed by the Government. Those are separate and distinct bonds that will go into the market and be sold everywhere. But in the prosecution of such a work as this, the company will be obliged to issue bonds the interest of which will not be guaranteed by the Government. Those bonds will be valuable to the stockholder in proportion to the amount of stock he may own; but if the stock is fully paid in, there is no inducement for the stockholder to take the bonds—I mean the bonds the interest of which is not guaranteed by the Government.

That is not all. I will not discuss the point, but it is precisely here; it is a right belonging to the company itself to make assessments or not, and to make them when they want them; and that right should not be enforced in the act of incorporation. Every corporation assesses its stockholders according to the exigencies of the work, and according to the necessities they have of making purchases of iron, and of paying for everything. If we insert in this bill a provision obliging them to assess five dollars a share every six months until the whole par value of every share is paid in, it will prevent men from taking the stock in the first place, and in the next place it is not according to the genius of the bill itself. The bill was not constructed with that view, that the stockholders should pay the par value of their stock to begin with, or as fast as the work progresses.

Mr. CONNESS. I disagree entirely with the objections made by the Senator from Kansas to the provisions that he has discussed. I do not agree with the Senator when he says it is not in accordance with the scheme of this bill and with the scheme for the construction of the Pacific railroad. It will be remembered that the scheme upon which this bill at least is predicated is, that the Government of the United States guaranty the payment of the interest upon the bonds to be issued by the various companies in case the companies fail to pay the interest themselves. I ask the Senator from Kansas, how can the companies but fail to pay the interest if they do not subscribe and pay in their money for their subscriptions of stock?

Mr. POMEROY. The point I was making was, not that they should not be assessed, but that it should not be made obligatory on them in the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that.

Mr. POMEROY. There are one hundred millions of stock to be assessed here, which will be sufficient to pay the interest on ninety millions that you guaranty.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that. The objection of the Senator is that the bill requires bona fide subscriptions and bona fide payments, and he says that requiring that kind of subscription and payment will prevent investment in it and the taking of the stock. Well, sir, if we can pass any law here or if we can insert any provision in this bill that will prevent men that have no money and cannot raise it from becoming subscribers, and burdening the books of the company with their names, I think we cannot do better than insert it, and if such a provision is now found in the bill, we cannot do better than preserve it there.

The Senator says there will be needed doubtless in addition to the bonds provided to be issued by this bill upon which the Government guaranty the payment of the interest, other bonds of the company the interest of which will not be guaranteed. There is the rub. That is where the shoe pinches—right there. If we do not require them to be bona fide subscribers, if we simply guaranty the payment of the interest upon ninety millions of their bonds, they failing to pay the interest, and not require them to pay in honest subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation, of course the result will be that they will have to issue their bonds, they will have to become borrowers abroad. How? In their corporate capacity, of course.

But this scheme, I undertake to say, is not predicated upon any such system or want of system. In good faith we present and offer to the moneyed men of the country the credit of the Government of the United States and the guarantee that the United States will pay if necessary to the extent of $90,000,000 in gold in the shape of interest to accrue upon the bonds of those companies. For the purpose of securing good faith to us and to the Government we intend just this provision, that they shall pay and invest their money, and that those who have not the money to invest shall keep out and go upon the stock exchange or somewhere else and carry on their operations. There is no better provision than this contained in the bill. It is a liberal provision, too, sir. It gives them ten years in which to pay up their subscriptions of stock, requiring the directors to assess not less than five per cent. within every six months. I humbly submit that a stockholder who is not prepared to pay five dollars on the hundred within six months had better keep out and go into some other business that he is capacitated for and that his fortune is adapted to.

Before I close, Mr. President, I desire to correct one mistake into which my honorable friend from Michigan has fallen by calling what is properly to be denominated the middle section of this great work, that between the one hundredth degree and the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada, the main line. There are branches on the eastern end of this road; but it is the main line beyond that, and there are to be no branches there.

I desire to state also in this connection that the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, organized in accordance with the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment or supplement, have entered upon the building of the main Pacific railroad. They have already constructed and finished and are running cars upon some thirty-two miles of the road to-day. They have subscribed largely to the stock, and have paid in more than a million and a quarter of dollars. They have paid in, not ten per cent. on $2,000,000, which would be $200,000, but about $1,250,000 of their own money, and no bonds of the Government have yet been issued to them. This bill provides for the issuing of bonds to them in the proper way.

I desired in passing to make this statement to show that we on the Pacific slope, so deeply interested in this great work, have engaged honestly and earnestly in its construction, that we are in favor of just such a provision as this to make every subscriber pay in money for the construction of the work, so that it shall not always be when the day comes that the interest falls due upon the bonds provided to be issued that the Government must in every case pay, and it thus be a gratuity on the part of the Government of the entire $90,000,000, but so that the subscribers being bona fide subscribers, having as required to do paid their subscription on their stock, shall be able to pay their interest like men, we agreeing on the part of the Government to pay the interest when they fail. I am glad that discussion has arisen here upon this proposition, because the country should understand that while we are engaged in offering the most munificent provision to the moneyed men of the country for engaging in this work we intend at the same time that it shall be entered upon and carried out in good faith, not by speculators, but by men of substance who are interested in the public welfare and who desire to seek an increase of their fortune in the most legitimate manner.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from California does not understand, or does not seem to understand, the motive I had in calling the attention (I did not move an amendment) of the chairman of the committee to this clause. It was simply to say that it was an unusual provision, that I had never seen it in any corporation before.

The Senator has alluded to some men that may propose to subscribe and do not intend to pay their subscriptions. I do not know any one that has subscribed, or who would be likely to subscribe, that is not able to pay his ten per cent. and finally his hundred per cent. It is an intimation that I have never heard of before.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, I have made no intimation at all. I have not dealt with the Senator's motives. I concede them to be as fair as mine. I have made no intimation regarding any subscriber. I have discussed the proposition fairly as the Senator presented it.

Mr. POMEROY. I understood the Senator to say that parties who did not intend to pay their subscriptions had better spend their time speculating in Wall street.

Mr. CONNESS. I did say so.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not design to move any amendment to this clause. I called the attention of the Senate to it simply as an unusual provision, and one that I thought would prevent the taking of the stock. I still think so; but if the chairman of the committee thinks it is a provision that ought to be in the bill I certainly shall not undertake to strike it out.

Mr. HOWARD. I do most sincerely confess that I regard this provision of the bill as very essential. Indeed, with me it would be a condition precedent to voting for the rest of the bill. If this clause was stricken out I certainly could not, according to my present convictions, vote for the remainder of the bill. The Government, certainly, is entitled to some little security that this corporation shall make an endeavor to pay the interest which it will owe from year to year, and this is really the only security which we have in the bill that they will make that attempt. Is it unreasonable? It seems to me it is not unreasonable. We have abandoned all the forfeitures in the old bill. We have no right to put our hand on this property and call it forfeited for the breach of condition. We have dispensed with that and released all forfeitures. I ask my friend from Kansas whether it is unreasonable to ask of a bona fide stockholder and subscriber, an honest man, who wants to see this road built and who wants to assist in building it, to contribute upon his certificate of $100 ten dollars a year to carry on this project and to aid the company in performing its obligation of repaying to the United States the interest which the United States may have to pay? Is it unreasonable? It seems to me not.

Mr. POMEROY. It was not the hardship that I was talking about. I did not say I did not want him to pay it. I do. It is only because I thought it belonged to the corporation to make the assessments, and that it should not be declared by act of Congress.

Mr. CONNESS. I so understood the Senator. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the motion? The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no motion before the Senate. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended by the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to call the Senator's attention to one more provision in this same section. It is this clause in line one hundred and five:

But no director, officer, or employee of the company shall act as the attorney or proxy of any shareholder at any annual or other meeting of the stockholders.

That is a provision that I have never before seen in any corporation, forbidding any person employed by the company to take the proxy of a stockholder and vote at the annual meeting.

Mr. HOWARD. The language is, "no director, officer, or employee of the company shall act as the attorney or proxy of any shareholder at any annual or other meeting of the stockholders." That is not an unusual provision in charters. The object is to make the proxy or attorney as free as possible from all extraneous influences, to make him impartial in the administration and discharge of his duty. I certainly regard that as a very essential clause in the bill.

Mr. POMEROY. The business of the man who votes as proxy for another is to vote according to his instructions, and the attorney may as well be a director or a stockholder or an employee of the company as anybody else. It is only for him to vote the proxy under the instructions of the shareholder who gives it to him. It occurred to me that it might be an inconvenience to forbid persons connected with this road to vote as the proxy of others when they attend the annual meeting.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe there is no motion made to strike out.

Mr. POMEROY. No; I will not make that motion. I thought the Senator would make it.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; I think not. I regard that as a very essential clause. It is certainly very conservative in its influence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the committee as amended?

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to submit several amendments to that amendment which I have not had time to prepare, and I therefore move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, there are one or two amendments that I should like to suggest.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to that, and I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this clause in the one hundred and fifty-seventh line of the first section:

The Government directors shall be ex officio members of all standing committees.

I suggest to the chairman of the committee and to the Senate that that provision may be very inconvenient. Companies often appoint committees, say of three; there are two Government directors; and if you put both the Government directors upon every committee you will always have a committee as large as five. These Government directors are to look after the interests of the Government; and it occurs to me that it would be better to say, "at least one of the Government directors shall be a member of each standing committee."

Mr. HOWARD. When we have a corporation of such magnitude as this, it seems to me we may assume that the standing committees will consist of more than three persons. The board of directors will consist of twenty-one, and it is not very likely that any of their standing committees will consist of less than five. The clause was framed on that idea, and it was framed at the suggestion of one of the present Government directors. Under the old law the Government directors had no power or authority whatever.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest to the Senator that as there will be not only an executive committee and a committee on finance, but various other committees, and as these two Government directors are to be on all the committees, they cannot act on these various committees meeting in different parts of the country at the same time.

Mr. HOWARD. My reply to that is, I am a member of three standing committees of this body, which committees very frequently are all in session on the same day and at the same hour.

Mr. POMEROY. Not all over the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. It is about as difficult for me to distribute myself on these three committees as it would be for these two Government directors to attend all the committees that may be raised. I believe, in short, in giving to the Government directors full power and authority to inspect, and, so far as possible for them to do, to control the proceedings of this corporation. The Government is vastly interested in it. The bill gives them the right not only of constituting a part of every one of the standing committees, but gives to them the further right of visitation, substantially, of all the affairs of the company, and requires them to report from time to time to the Secretary of the Interior any information which they may have in their possession fit for him to know, and whenever he shall call upon them for information. I look upon it as very important that these gentlemen thus representing the Government and the interests of the Government in this corporation should have very large powers; for it will be impossible, or next to impossible, at least, for them to abuse their powers, and I foresee that some advantage will result from giving them most ample authority.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I concur entirely in the propriety of these Government directors having the power of visitation and ample authority to look into the affairs of this company and protect the interests of the Government; and it was not with a view of taking from them any of these powers that I made the suggestion. It occurred to me that there might be an inconvenience in having both of the Government directors upon all of these committees. I am not very familiar with the internal arrangements of railroad corporations, but I was under the impression that they often had committees of three persons, and in a board of twenty-one directors I thought it might subject the company to inconvenience if we required them to have the two Government directors upon every committee. I am for the railroad bill, I wish it to be understood; I am earnestly in favor of it; and I want the bill in such a way as that it will work, that there will be no unnecessary jarring of the machinery; and I thought if we said that at least one of them should be upon each standing committee, it would perhaps avoid some difficulty and some inconvenience. That is the only object I have in it.

Mr. GRIMES. The best way would be to increase the number of Government directors from three to five.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That would make it more unwieldy.

Mr. GRIMES. That would only be a fair proportion. There are now twenty-one directors and only two Government directors.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not my proposition, and I have no intention to make a proposition, to take away from the Government directors any of their authority of visitation or power to look into the affairs of this company at any time. I entirely concur in what the Senator from Michigan, the chairman of the committee, has said on that subject; but it does strike me, and I confess I am not quite satisfied about it now, that it would be better to say "at least one of these directors shall be upon each of the standing committees;" and both might be put on still, notwithstanding such a provision.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire simply to suggest to the honorable Senator from Illinois that whatever condition you make upon this particular point will be a condition precedent; the company will be aware of it; and they will adapt their committees to it, whatever it is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it will produce an inconvenience to leave it as it is. It seems to me we do not want all the Government directors on every one of these committees, and, as has been well said by the Senator from Kansas, acting at the same time. They must be upon every committee, to carry on this great undertaking, if they discharge their duty. The Senator from Michigan says he is on several committees. I know it, and he discharges his duty very faithfully on all of them. With the view of testing the question, I will move to insert the words "at least one of" before the word "the," in the one hundred and fifty-seventh line of the first section, so that it will read:

At least one of the Government directors shall be an ex officio member of all standing committees.

Then I will move the other amendment below, to make the phraseology complete, if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HOWARD. Let us see how this will work. At least one of these two Government directors shall be a member of each standing committee. Suppose the company to have become organized, its board of directors regularly formed, and its standing committees regularly appointed. Then the provision of the Senator from Illinois is looked at, and it declares that at least one of these two persons shall be a member of each of these standing committees. Which one, sir? Who is to determine? Which of these two Government directors is to take his seat in the committee-room of a given one of these standing committees? John Doe says he will not, and Richard Roe, the other director, says he will not do so, and I suppose they would have to appeal to reconcile their differences perhaps to the honorable Senator from Illinois who has offered this amendment. How is he going to make the selection of the one Government director who is going to occupy a seat upon this committee or that committee? He does not explain that. I see no inconvenience whatever in saying to both these Government directors, "You shall be under an obligation to act as members of each one of these standing committees;" for we do not say in so many words that each one shall sit and act at the same time with each one of these committees, but each one can have an opportunity of visiting each one of the standing committees. The proposition of the Senator from Illinois, who has had this clause under his consideration ever since it has been proposed to the committee, renders it utterly impracticable. It destroys entirely the object aimed at by this provision. I had hoped to have the support of the honorable Senator from Illinois in the passage of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry that my friend from Michigan looks upon this proposition in the light he does. Suppose this road to be in operation; you want a finance committee in the city of New York, where the principal office is to be, and where you want one of your Government directors to see how the finances of the company are carried on, and its general business; you want another committee on the line of the road, probably a construction committee; how are you going to have the two directors you have got members of both committees? There is no difficulty as to which of the directors shall be upon a committee if it is said one shall be. Cannot the president of the board of directors appoint the committee and designate one of them? One of them is made by your law a member of the committee, so that he is compelled to put one on. Can he not make the selection? We have fifty Senators, and we have got a rule that there shall be a Committee on Finance composed of seven Senators. Who is to determine what members shall be on that committee? The Presiding Officer.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator assumes that the appointment of the standing committees is to be by the president of the board of directors. It so happens that the bill does not contain any such clause.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill authorizes the directors to make by-laws and regulations not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the country; and does not the Senator from Michigan know that every board adopts its by-laws and provides for the appointment of its committees, and either vests the power in the president or somebody else? I am astonished at such sort of objections as these, and I am astonished at any feeling on this question on the part of the Senator from Michigan. It is to facilitate the operations of this company that I have made the suggestion. You have got but two Government directors, and you propose to have them on every committee. It seems to me that will work inconvenience. If the Senate does not think so, keep them both on all the committees. It is not a matter that I care to discuss; but I cannot assent to the idea which is suggested here that there is a difficulty in determining which of the two shall be on a committee because the law does not provide that the president shall appoint the committees, when you have given authority to the directors to make their by-laws, and one of the provisions of the by-laws in all corporations of this kind is a provision determining how its committees shall be appointed. The law merely determines that one of these persons must go upon a committee. It does not say which. That may be settled by the by-laws of the company, under the appointment of the presiding officer of the directors, or by election of the board of directors.

Mr. HOWARD. We are now acting on the bill which we propose to convert into a law. We are not passing by-laws for this company, nor making provisions for the passage of by-laws, nor saying what by-laws may be passed or may not be passed. We are passing a law regulating the organization of the company. What the board of directors might do or might not do in the way of the passing of by-laws, neither the Senator from Illinois nor myself, however confident he may be, can predict. We do not know whether any provision will be made in the by-laws authorizing the president of the company to appoint the standing committees, or whether that right would be retained in the board itself, to be executed upon a regular balloting of the members of the board. I say that the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois leaves the matter so uncertain as to which of these two directors shall be employed upon this, that, or the other committee, that it defeats the very object of the clause. There is no feeling on the subject, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. The view that I take of this provision is that the law simply provides that these two Government directors have the privilege and right and shall be counted as members of the committees. I do not think that provision is obnoxious to the statement made by the Senator from Kansas, requiring them to divide themselves, and requiring their presence at two different points at once. Not at all. As I suggested briefly before, this being a condition precedent and a condition of the law, the directors will immediately adapt themselves to it; the Government directors will have the right to a seat upon every committee; the committee may do its business if the Government directors be not present, or if they cannot be present; but the Government has a right to representation there. That is the way I understand the provision. I think that is right and useful.

Mr. MORGAN. The objection that has been raised by the Senator from Illinois is on account of the inconvenience that would arise from a large number. I think the matter will be simplified if he will look at it as it will exist. There will practically be but two committees, one the finance committee and the other the executive committee; and it is very proper that the Government directors should be at least upon both those committees. They substantially have the management and whole control of the company. The power of the board is vested in those two committees. I think the bill as reported by the Railroad Committee is not objectionable; on the contrary, I think it is eminently proper.

Mr. POMEROY. I want the chairman of the committee to understand that I like the bill and am supporting it, and I would make no amendment to it unless I thought it would improve it, and I would only make that by way of suggestion. These two Government directors are not obliged to be present, as the Senator from California very well says; one of them may be present; but they have a right to be there. I think, however, there is another very important committee besides those named by the Senator from New York, which is the committee on construction, to oversee the construction of the road.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the duty of the executive committee.

Mr. POMEROY. The executive committee have a right to appoint that committee, but the executive committee in New York cannot be on the line to supervise the construction of the road. As there are two Government directors, one can be in the East and one in the West. I think there will be no inconvenience.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no desire to have the amendment adopted if the provision as it stands will not subject the company to inconvenience. If gentlemen who are more familiar with such things than I am think it will not I will withdraw the amendment and not insist upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is another portion of the bill that strikes me as very objectionable, and which it seems will operate very much against the construction of the road and will tend to increase the expense of constructing it very much. I allude to what is embraced on the 9th page, between line twenty-two and line thirty-four of the second section. I move to strike out all after the word "unpaid" in line twenty-two on page 9 down to the word "and" in the thirty-third line of the same page. The words which I move to strike out are these:

All contracts for labor and services, materials of every description, and for transportation, which may be made by or on behalf of said company, shall be terminable at the pleasure of said company, or of the directors thereof, by notice in writing to the other contracting parties, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns; and upon and after service of such notice, all liability and obligation on account thereof, on the part of the company, shall cease and determine, except in so far as performance shall be by either party required during the six months next succeeding such service; and all such contracts of said company shall contain or be deemed to contain a clause providing for such termination thereof.

It does seem to me that contractors and other persons will be very slow to enter into obligations with this Pacific Railroad Company when there is no mutuality about the obligation. The man who makes a contract with this railroad company for transportation is to be at the mercy of the company. They may avoid the contract at any time they please. If the parties who engage on the line of this road in the working of iron mines and the manufacture of iron should enter into a contract with this railroad company for the transportation of their iron, to last two or three years, it will be in the power of the company at any time, notwithstanding the contract, to declare the contract at an end, without any damages, of course, "except in so far as performance shall be by either party required during the six months next succeeding such service." The party would have a right to insist on carrying out the contract for six months. So in regard to persons who may take contracts for the construction of the road.

The very idea of a contract is that it shall be binding upon both parties. There must be mutuality about it. The option is not given to the party who contracts with the company, but it is entirely with the company to avoid contracts or not. It seems to me that responsible parties will be very slow to enter into obligations with a company at whose mercy they are to be. I think the provision ought to be stricken out, and that any contract which this railroad company makes should be as binding upon it as an individual's contract is upon him. The Senator from Iowa has been talking about monopolies, and he objects to this bill as a great monopoly. Why, let me ask, is this railroad corporation to be taken out of the general rule in regard to individuals and other parties in reference to the contracts they shall make?

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator, I hope, does not intend to convey the impression that I am in favor of that provision.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all; but I was merely making use of the Senator's argument in favor of my proposition to strike out these words.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Illinois certainly cannot be ignorant of the fact that many contracts are so drawn between the parties as to be made determinable at the option of the one or the other as they shall agree. Almost all public contracts are made in that form. Post office contracts, contracts for public supplies, and a great variety of contracts contain such a provision enabling one of the contracting parties to determine it at his option. The object of the clause which the Senator from Illinois moves to strike out is to guard against the danger of an outgoing board of directors making fraudulent contracts, or contracts which may be disadvantageous to the company and very much to the advantage of favorites, and to enable an incoming board, upon giving due notice, say of six months, to determine and put an end to any such objectionable contract. It is made strictly in the interest of the company, and for the purpose of guarding and protecting its rights against improvident contracts, or contracts that may be given out to favorites of A, B, C, or D belonging to the company; and I submit that it is an important clause to be contained in this charter. It reserves to the board of directors the power of putting an end, after a notice of six months, to any contract for supplies or for transportation. Certainly no injury is likely to arise from it. Such a contract cannot be determined except upon due notice of six months. Due notice is to be served upon the contractor, and the contract cannot be put an end to until the lapse of six months from the time of the service of that notice.

These were the reasons why the committee inserted this clause in the bill. I think that it is a most salutary and necessary clause, and that it ought to be retained. It is not very likely that in the case of an honest contractor his rights or contract would be interfered with by the board of directors; certainly not for any trivial or inconsiderable reason. But, as I said before, the object is in the case of a fraudulent, unfair, or disadvantageous contract entered into from sinister purposes, to enable the board to put an end to it on giving reasonable notice.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan if it is certain that the succeeding board of directors will be any more honest than their predecessors; and if not, why the succeeding board under his bill as he has it, will not be just as likely through favoritism and fraud to set aside the contracts made by their predecessors and give the same work to a set of favorites of their own? If we are to regard each board of directors as, the one as likely as the other, to be an honest board, then the presumption that the old board will have entered into contracts which will bind their successors of an extravagant or a fraudulent character is no greater than the presumption that the succeeding board will set aside the contracts of their predecessors for the purpose of giving fraudulent and extravagant contracts to their friends. It is as broad as it is long.

Mr. COLLAMER. This does not confine the vacating of contracts to a succeeding board.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir. I will answer the Senator from Illinois by asking another question. I ask the Senator, if he were a member of this company, whether he would not as such think it a privilege not entirely to be disregarded to be enabled to put his hand upon an unjust or disadvantageous contract, and put an end to it; or whether he would, having discovered the character of such a contract, be proud to carry it out, and to allow the contracting party to carry off his ill-gotten gains; in short, whether he would not like to have the remedy in his own hands perpetually, so far as he could conveniently and lawfully. It seems to me there can be but one answer to such a question as that. The sole object of this provision, as I said before, is to keep this remedy in the hands of the corporation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. Before the vote is taken on this subject, allow me to say a word. It appears to me that there are especial reasons for retaining such a provision as this in this bill. Let me give a single illustration, and invite the attention of Senators to it. It is not necessary for me to state that there is no purpose on the part of the producers of this act, those who have prepared it, to incur it with any restriction that shall militate against its being carried out and the great road being built. Let me give you an illustration now of what might be the operation of a board of directors under this act without a provision like this, and how it would work to the company and to the enterprise itself. Let us take the article of railroad iron, which to-day is worth one hundred and ten or one hundred and twenty dollars a ton. Suppose a board of directors contracts for the entire amount that may be needed for the Union Pacific railroad, extending from the one hundredth meridian to the western boundary of the State of Nevada: the rebellion is over; gold finds its level; the business of the country finds its level; iron is worth forty dollars a ton again. Now, what a nice operation that is, singly and alone for the contractors whom those directors have enabled to make such an immense amount of money out of this company. I hope that before a vote is taken gentlemen will consider that this is an unusual scheme, that it is not a road composed of one, or two, or three sections, comprehended by forty, sixty, or one hundred miles in length, but that it proposes to build a road two thousand and odd miles in length.

Are we afraid that under a restriction of this kind contractors will not be found who will take the contracts and engage to perform the work? If contractors are scarce for once, I do not know but that I was going to say a great blessing; it would be an unusual fact, to say the least. If this restriction can be changed for the better, I have no objection for one that that shall be done; but let not this restriction be stricken out. There is a necessity for power to be lodged with the directors, to prevent the consummation of what may be fraud, that would be utterly ruinous to the company. I hope it will not now be stricken out.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The arguments used for keeping this clause in the bill are most extraordinary. The Government itself has no right to repudiate a contract. Gentlemen argue here in favor of conferring upon this company the right to repudiate a contract that has been fairly made by its agent, a power that does not belong to any corporation, to the Government, nor to any individual in this country. The argument used by the Senator from California is most extraordinary. He says that if this company should make a contract for the iron to build their entire road, and then the iron should decline in price, the company ought to have the right to repudiate that contract: why?

Because the iron has fallen. In other words, the man who has made the contract with them in good faith to furnish iron, and employed his money and his means to get it, ought to be entirely ruined because this company ought to have power! That is the argument; it is nothing more. It would be a great outrage and a great wrong to confer this extraordinary power on any company, or upon Government, or upon individuals anywhere. I undertake to say that this company, like individuals and all other companies and Governments, ought to be bound by the contracts made by their agents. If they employ agents who act fraudulently toward them, I see no good reason in the world why they should not turn out those agents and employ honest ones. If a contract is made fraudulently, I do not understand that the company is bound by it anyhow; and the Senator from California wishes to avoid the effect upon the company of fraudulent contracts.

There is another view of this question. Large moneyed companies like this have great advanages over individuals in all business transactions that they have with them. When you confer an act of incorporation upon a company, you confer extraordinary powers that do not belong to individuals. The act of incorporation itself is an extraordinary power; but when you undertake to confer upon a company the power that is granted by the provision now under consideration, in my judgment it would be a great outrage and a great wrong; it would be conferring on them the right to repudiate their contracts whenever they see proper.

Mr. HOWARD. The question before the Senate is not whether any natural person or corporation already in existence has the right to repudiate his or its contracts. That is by no means the question. We are now engaged in constructing an artificial being known as a corporation, and imparting to it such faculties as we may see fit to impart. The question before the Senate is whether we shall impart to this artificial being, the corporation, a power under certain circumstances to terminate a certain description of its contracts at its will, by giving due notice to the contracting parties. It cannot be alleged against such a proposition that it is unjust, because it is not unjust to a man to enter into a contract with him when he knows that you will in a contingency have the power to put an end to the contract. He enters into the contract with a full knowledge and notice that you may do so if you see fit, and he therefore has nothing to complain of. The simple question here is whether in the creation of this railroad corporation it is expedient for us to give it the faculty of determining a certain description of its contracts at its own will by giving a certain amount of notice to the opposite contracting party. I see no injustice in it; on the other hand, I see in it a very salutary and protective influence to the real interests of the corporation, because we all know very well that however honest, however circumspect, however vigilant may be a board of directors in a bank or in a corporation of any kind, it is very possible for them to be occasionally imposed upon by shrewd and cunning contractors who are anxious to obtain jobs at their hands.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to put a question to the Senator. This road will be sublet in sections of twenty or forty miles to contractors. Is he of opinion that he can get sub-contractors to convey their hands, tools, and machinery eight hundred or a thousand miles on a contract that the company can abrogate by giving six months' notice? I am very clear that you cannot with that provision sub-contract your road.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no doubt on that point. I have no question about the readiness of persons who want employment to enter into the employment of this road. There will be no dearth of hands to labor upon it, no want of employes the moment the ground is broken. I think this is a very essential provision to be retained in the bill, because the effect of it is to enable the company from time to time, as it shall see fit, with the knowledge of the contracting party that it has that power, to terminate any contract. I look upon it as a great advantage to the company, and no injustice to the contracting party.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to inquire of the Senator before he sits down whether, if these words are stricken out, there is anything to prevent the company from making a contract that shall be determinable at their pleasure in case they can find parties willing to enter into such contracts? I wish to ask if they will not have the power anyhow without putting it in here to make such contracts if they can find parties willing to enter into them?

Mr. HOWARD. I certainly had always entertained that opinion; but judging from the speech which the honorable Senator from Illinois made a few minutes since, one would be led to suppose that such a thing was impossible, that it was wrong and entirely irregular to make a one-sided contract. I never had any doubt about the right of a man or a woman to make such a one-sided contract, nor have I now. Nor have I any doubt as to the power of this company, in case this clause be stricken out, to make such a contract if it sees fit to do so; but my purpose is to make it obligatory on the company to insert this clause in every contract into which it enters for supplies, for services, or for transportation, so that all contracting parties shall be kept on their guard in respect to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose the difficulty would be to find persons to enter into such a contract. I am aware that parties may make any contracts they please, and they will bind them unless they are so unconscionable and unjust that a court of equity will set them aside on the ground of fraud or some undue advantage having been taken by one party of the other. But I do not see any necessity for putting this provision in the law, if the company has power to make such a contract at any rate in case it can find parties willing to contract on such terms.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am certainly under very great obligations to the Senator from Michigan for the great trouble he has taken to inform me exactly what is the question that is before the Senate. He is entitled to my thanks, and I return them to him for it; but while he is giving information to others, I suggest to the Senator that he had better enlighten himself exactly as to the effect that his bill will have. I undertake to say that if the proposed clause be inserted in each contract that is made, the road will cost more than it would otherwise, because no man will enter into a contract with the company that may be abrogated in six months at the pleasure of the company, unless he can make a much larger profit than he would otherwise demand.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] when he was up before, called attention to my position as being in advocacy of a violation of contracts. The Senator certainly misunderstood me.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is an implication. I did not mean to charge the Senator with that. I meant only to say that the Senator favored the granting of power to abrogate the contracts; I used the term "repudiate."

Mr. CONNESS. I hold in my hand the report of the organization and proceedings of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, which company we are now legislating for as nearly as we can be said to be legislating for any company. They have organized for the purpose of the construction of the center of this great road, General John A. Dix, president. I find that their perspicuity and their experience have developed just such a provision in their by-laws, and it is already included in them. The experience of railroad men has suggested the necessity of a provision very nearly like this. I will read it from page 37 of their proceedings: it occurs in the form of a resolution, thus:

"Resolved, That in all contracts for materials and construction that may be made prior to the obtaining the desired legislation of Congress amending the company's charter, a clause shall invariably be inserted reserving the power in this board, its executive committee, or any officer of the company duly authorized, to terminate such contract at any time when they shall think proper, without claims for damage on the part of the contractors for any material not delivered or work not actually done."

The only difference between this provision adopted voluntarily by the constructors of this road and the provision proposed to be stricken out of the bill which was introduced into it by the committee, is found in this: the provision of the bill is that "all contracts for labor and services, materials of every description, and for transportation," shall be subject to this condition, while the rule adopted by the Union Pacific Railroad Company is that this restriction shall be applied to all contracts for materials and construction. The bill applies the restriction also to contracts for labor, and services, and transportation. Whether the provision now proposed to be stricken out should be made to conform to the provision adopted voluntarily by the Union Pacific Railroad Company is a question, I suppose, of not much importance. That may be done, if the Senate prefer; but to strike out of the law providing for the construction of the great Pacific railroad, which is applicable to six companies, the equivalent of a provision adopted by this great company, seems to me to be an unwarranted proceeding on our part.

I certainly never meant that an honest contract should be broken; but I meant in advocating the retention of this clause and this power in the board of directors, that it should be a restriction upon the directors, and make it unprofitable to them to make such contracts, and unprofitable to contractors to enter into contracts that would be palpably in violation of the interests of the company and the country. I hope this clause will not be stricken out. If the Senate refuse to strike it out, they can, if they please, make the provision conform to the provision in the organization of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, which will make it apply to contracts for materials and construction only, and I rather think that would be a good change.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A single word in reply to the Senator from California, and I will not trouble the Senate again. If this provision is in the by-laws of the company, and enters into the contracts, and persons see proper to make contracts with such provision in them, I see no objection to that. The company have the power ample and sufficient to do that with the consent of the contractors.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will permit me right here to say that one company has adopted this. We are making a law to govern six companies. The law should be uniform. We have no guarantee that each of those six companies will adopt such a provision. I suggest to the Senator in all reason that if the company who have organized and agreed to build this road from the one hundredth meridian to the eastern boundary of the State of California have voluntarily subjected themselves to a provision of this kind, it is certainly no hardship to them nor to the other companies to insert such a provision in the law, so that it shall be more than a by-law to each of the companies.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no trouble about it. If the Senator from California and I enter into a contract, and I agree in that contract that he shall terminate it in six months, that is a part of my contract. If the men with whom you contract agree that you shall have the power to terminate it, that is all right and proper. What I object to is the conferring the power on the company without such contract to terminate it at their will by giving six months' notice. I say the power is extraordinary, it ought not to be granted; it enables the company to commit frauds on everybody everywhere, except with those that they make a written contract with. Where you put it into the contract, there is no trouble, as I have shown; but your law does not require you to put it into the contract. You go on and contract as the Senator from California says, for the iron to construct the road; the iron falls in price; the person with whom you have contracted has obtained it at a high price in order that he may comply with his contract; if it is worth forty dollars a ton now, he gets the iron at that price; if it falls off to twenty dollars, you can give six months' notice under the bill if it be passed as it is now, and take no bar of his iron, and buy other iron at the price at which you can then buy it, under the provisions of the bill as presented to the Senate to-day.

Mr. CONNESS. I reply to the Senator from Illinois that I have no objection, and I think his suggestion is a good one, to require the company in each case to insert this as a condition in each contract they make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to this same section. By section two there is no provision for collecting the unpaid stock, and the only provision for enforcing the remedy is to forfeit the stock. The company is required absolutely to forfeit the stock in case a stockholder fails to pay. There ought to be a provision authorizing the company to sell the stock or to collect the unpaid balance. Both powers ought to be given to the company; otherwise a stockholder might, after paying the first installment, finding it was a losing operation, refuse to go further; he might have exercised great power over the organization of the company, and yet simply by failing to pay under the provisions of the bill as it now stands, his stock would be forfeited and he be under no further liability. The amendment that I propose authorizes the company to sell the stock, in which case he will get the benefit of any surplus over the unpaid assessments, and authorizing the company also to sue at their discretion for the amount due on stock. I send the amendment to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in line eighteen of section two of the committee's amendment to strike out the word "shall" and insert "may at the discretion of said company;" and after the word "company," in line nineteen, to insert "or at the discretion of said company the said stock may be sold at public auction subject to future assessments, at the exchange in the city of New York after ten days' notice published in a daily newspaper in said city, or, at the discretion of said company, the amount due on said stock may be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. HOWARD. I have not the slightest objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. It occurs to me that in the beginning of the second section the company is subjected to a very great expense which may be unnecessary. I will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that he has provided in the fourth line of the second section that notices of every assessment shall have ten insertions in newspapers in eight of the cities of the United States, in all the cities of the United States where books have been opened. It is required that the notice shall be published for ten successive days. It occurs to me that it will be a great expense with very little to accrue from it.

Mr. HOWARD. The great object was to give ample notice of the calling in of assessments.

Mr. POMEROY. The law obliges assessments to be made once in six months now. Then to provide that in eight cities of the United States they shall insert a notice of them ten times will be a great expense to the company.

Mr. HOWARD. That provision is on the idea that the stockholders will be pretty well distributed about the United States, that there will be stockholders in at least eight of the principal cities where the notice is to be published. I do not see how we can very well avoid giving notice in each of those cities. It is not likely that it will be a source of much expense to the company, though the expense will be something, but it will be a great convenience to the stockholders to have notice brought home to their own doors.

Mr. HARLAN. If the chairman of the committee has proposed all the amendments he desires to propose and no other Senator wishes to propose an amendment to-night, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that motion is put, allow me to ask the Senate to take up a bill so as to have it in order to-morrow.

Mr. GRIMES. This bill comes up to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand not. Does the Senator from Michigan propose to proceed with this bill to-morrow?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I shall not interpose.

Mr. GRIMES. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, May 19, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. Hosmer, of Buffalo, New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

STATE GOVERNMENT FOR NEVADA.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 267, to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States." It simply changes the time for the ratification of the State constitution from October to September.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, ordered to be read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McBRIDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act (No. 265) to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the bill (H. R. No. 240) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1865, and upon which the main question had been ordered.

First amendment:

Page 36, after line six hundred and eighteen, insert: For payment of the expenses incident to the removal of the Pawnee Indians from Kansas, and their reestablishment in their own country, $9,726 33.

The amendment was agreed to.

Second amendment:

Strike out "seventeen" and insert "ten" in the following clause:

For expenses of transportation and delivery of annuity goods to the Blackfoot Indians for the year, $17,000.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho, (by unanimous consent.) A statement was made yesterday that a proposition had been made to transport the goods sought to be covered by this appropriation for six cents per pound, that the department refused it, and let it at six cents a pound. This matter being personal to the department, I felt it my duty to call upon that officer in relation to that statement. He has authorized me to state to the House, in this connection, that the bids are there to speak for themselves; that the party who was named in the statement yesterday, Mr. Labarge, was the contractor last year at six cents a pound, and that a large portion of the goods contracted to be transported are not delivered to this day; that he was in town when this contract was let, and declined to put in a bid; and there was no alternative for the department, under the law, to let the contract to the lowest bidder. I deem it a matter of justice to the department that this statement should be made. It shows the necessity of making liberal appropriations for the transportation of these goods. The Indian department is suffering now in consideration of the low figure at which that transportation was taken last year. The goods are not delivered yet; and I presume if the contract was let at the same price this year they never would be delivered. I make this statement in justice to the head of the Indian bureau.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. My information upon that subject was obtained from a letter I have now in my hands from Captain Labarge, who was the contractor last year at six cents a pound. He states that under that contract he had a right to take the contract this year at the same price; that he was at the department and had an interview with Dole and informed him that he was willing to take the contract this year at the same price as last year; that Dole refused and said he would receive new bids for the transportation of these goods. I understand the contract has been let at prices ranging from nine to twelve cents a pound.

The gentleman is mistaken in another matter. Captain Labarge was not in the city at the time of the letting of this contract, to my personal knowledge. This letter was dated at St. Louis a few days prior to the letting of this contract, and I know he was not here at the time. I understand Mr. Labarge is a respectable man, but I have no acquaintance with him myself, and am willing that the committee should have the benefit of the explanation here made.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Third amendment:

Strike out of the following clause "$150,050" and insert "$50,000."

For subsistence and clothing, and general incidental expenses of the Sisseton, Wahpaton, Medawakanton, and Wahpakoota bands of Sioux or Dakota Indians, at their new homes, $150,050.

Mr. STEVENS. With the permission of the House I desire to say that since last evening the Indian department has been consulted, and they say that $150,050 is the exact amount which, under the treaty we have abrogated, we owe to these Indians; and that that amount is necessary to keep them from starving.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know what the intentions of the Indian department may be upon this subject, but I do know that by an act passed last February we abrogated all treaties with those Indians, and whatever you give to those Indians now is a gratuity. But my object is not so much to strike down that amount as to get something for those who need it.

Mr. UPSON. Have not the Winnebagoes the means of subsistence?

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot understand how it is that thirteen hundred Indians need $150,000, while twenty-eight hundred need only $54,000, while they are living upon precisely the same reservation and under the same circumstances.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Anderson, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Cobb, Dawes, Briggs, Eckley, Edgerston, Finck, Garfield, Grinnell, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Lazear, Long, McIndoe, James R. Morris, Anos Myers, Orth, Perham, Price, Radford, William B. Randall, John B. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, William G. Steele, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Windom, and Fernando Wood—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Arnold, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Bliss, Brewster, Chandler, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Deming, Eden, Elliot, English, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Jencks, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, McBride, McClure, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Ross, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Stevens, Stiles, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Upson, William B. Washburn, and Wilder—59.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. LAZEAR stated that his colleague, Mr. ARONA, had been called home on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. ELIOT stated that Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was absent from his place on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were disposed of; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments to a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the Globe discloses that during my absence, and while the discussion in the contested-election case of Bruce and Loan was going on, matters transpired here of a character so peculiarly personal to myself that, for the first time in my life, I ask to be indulged for a few moments of explanation.

While I have held a seat here, Mr. Speaker, I have never at any time for a single moment entertained a particle of malice toward any individual member. In the many heated discussions in which I have participated, differing sometimes with friends as well as with opponents, while painfully conscious of an infirmity of speech in this respect which cannot be more mortifying to the best friend I have than to myself, nevertheless no shaft has been ever hurled by me that was dipped in gall. I have never thought it proper to attempt to make up for the feebleness of the missile in the virulence of the poison in which it was dipped; and whenever I have unintentionally drawn blood no man more willingly than myself has made reparation the first moment it was known that the slightest wound had been inflicted.

On the first day of the discussion of the contested election of Bruce and Loan it was my intention, as I then stated, to take no part in the debate; but when it appeared that the discussion was not to close that day, and as, according to a previous engagement that could not be dispensed with, I was obliged to leave the city that night, I rose, not more on my own motion than at the request of a colleague on the committee, to state in as few words as possible and without premeditation the views which my colleague and myself entertained on that question. But, sir, circumstances occurring at the moment which it would be difficult to make the House understand changed the current of my remarks to some extent. In the course of those remarks, when my attention was called to matters that were thought by others to need explanation, I made with great cheerfulness what seemed to me to be full reparation. If I had had the slightest thought that I came short of full reparation for any unkind remark that I may have then made I should have censured myself if I had not made the amende to the satisfaction of every person.

But, sir, whatever occasion others may have had to complain of any remarks which fell from me in that day's discussion, the Representative from the seventh district of Missouri had no occasion so to complain. Whatever allusion I made to him was in the kindest of terms and was honestly expressed. I had neither any occasion nor desire to say aught that could be construed by him or by any fair-minded man into a reflection on his personal character, or on his participation in any of the matters then under discussion. And, sir, in the remarks that I did make, I submit to the candid consideration of the House, there cannot be found a single word which would justify him in calling on me either for explanation or apology; and no single syllable has ever been pointed out requiring either.

And yet, sir, after I had announced before I had made these unpremeditated remarks, and as some reason why I sought the opportunity of making them, that I was obliged to leave the city that night and had paired off and could not be here at the final vote, the Representative from the seventh district of Missouri deliberately, at his room, with—as I understand—a copy of the reporter's notes of my remarks before him, and therefore reassured that I had not uttered a syllable unkind or disrespectful to him, with two days to revise it, prepared and wrote what he knew when he was putting it on paper he could safely deliver in my absence, a speech, sir, charged with the grossest and foulest accusations against my own personal integrity; and came here on Monday, as I am informed, and read from his manuscript that speech which in its language, in the bitterness and in the malignity with which its every sentence is surcharged, finds no parallel certainly in the records of this House since I have been a member of it. I shall ask the Clerk to read a single paragraph of it as a summing up of what he chose to say of me under these circumstances, knowing as well when he came here to deliver it as when he had prepared its malignity that I was not to be here to defend myself. I ask the Clerk to read from the Globe what I have marked.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The only deserving or proper reply that could be made to the statement of the gentleman is the epithet that Colonel Bouton once applied to Pettit of Indiana; but as I am inclined to think the language would not, as a general rule, be parliamentary, I will not use it; but if any gentleman will furnish me with a parliamentary phrase that will express the same idea I will thank him for the suggestion. A political guerrilla who flies a friendly flag that thereby he may the more safely and surely strike a fatal blow. The gentleman has fairly earned and no doubt will receive the scorn and contempt of every honest man; and here I leave this unpleasant subject."

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. Speaker, the remarks that I made were printed in the Globe upon Friday. I have never seen the reporter's notes. The Representative from the seventh district of Missouri has had an opportunity to read them; the House, if it has cared to, has read them also. And now, sir, without hesitation and most cheerfully, I submit these remarks as they were delivered and as they appear in the Globe, a demonstration of what I have said that not a syllable in that speech was or was intended or could by any ingenuity be tortured into anything offensive to the Representative of the seventh district of Missouri. They remained there in print until the Monday following as a commentary upon the speech an extract of which has been read at the Clerk's desk; and yet the Representative from the seventh congressional district of Missouri, not content with having prepared and written out a speech of the character there read, when he knew that if he delivered it at all it must be in the absence of him whom he was attacking, read it here in the House in cold blood behind my back; but further, not sure that he had done his work, four days afterwards, when it was published in the Globe, he crept to the printing office and caused to be printed with it, in the shape of a foot-note, what he himself in the body of his speech confessed was so coarse and vile an epithet that it would be a violation of the rules to utter it in the House.

"He is a great liar and a dirty dog."

Now, sir, I have not asked the attention of the House in order that I might show how able I am to compete with him or any one else in the use of vile epithets or viler billingsgate; or to hurl back upon the heads of those who uttered it the vituperation they have wasted at my feet.

For this reason I do not propose at this time to enter into any reply to attacks upon me in my absence, come they from what quarter they may.

It is not for me to apply a test of true courage to other men. The world will take for each of us the full measure of whatever of that quality we may possess. To its arbitrament I am willing to submit the decision of the question, whether there is more of courage or cowardice in making an unprovoked attack upon any man behind his back. All laurels, by whomsoever won on such an ignoble contest without an opponent, I shall leave undisturbed to grace the brows of those who think it an honor to wear them.

I have waited until this time in order that it might be demonstrated to others, what I knew myself, that this attack upon me did not depend for its existence upon anything which I had said or done. It has gone into the stereotyped pages of the Globe; whatever of injury it is capable of doing to me it has accomplished.

And now, sir, I have made up, to go along with it into the same pages, the record between myself and the Representative from the seventh congressional district of Missouri, before the tribunal of my constituents, this House and the country. And the judgment each shall render I shall cheerfully abide.

Mr. LOAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to say a word or two in reply to the member from Massachusetts.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOAN. I desire to state to the House that if in the discourse I delivered to which reference has been made there was anything said that was not justified by the speech to which I replied, it was unintentional on my part, and I regret it. It is true that I had the notes of the gentleman's speech before me. It is true that after careful deliberation I believed the reply I had prepared was nothing but a just and legitimate defense to the assault that had been made upon me in the most unprovoked manner, not on my case, but on my personal integrity. There was no ground for that. It was with the understanding that a deliberate, premeditated assault had been made upon me personally in this House in the reply the gentleman from Massachusetts made to a question of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WHALEY] that I made the personal remark to which exception has been taken. If, in the opinion of the House, that is not a justifiable reply, I ask the pardon of the House for having made it. After the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] this morning, I have no pardon to ask at his hands.

My invariable rule through life has been never to offer any insult to any one; and I inform him and this House that I have never allowed a sentiment of malice to reign in my heart toward any one. Whenever I have felt that I have been unjustifiably and unwarrantably attacked in my personal honor, I have always considered it to be my duty, and one which I have never shrunk from, and I never expect to shrink from, to defend myself to the best of my ability.

The gentleman from Massachusetts stated that my answer to his speech was made when his back was turned. I had no alternative. It is not my fault. He saw proper to vacate his seat. Nor is it my fault that he failed to correct any improper expression which reflected on me. He shot a Partisan arrow and then left. There was no alternative; no other course left to me. My defense to his assault was to be made in my speech, and I had no option as to the time at which the speech should be made.

I think proper to say that a friend of mine, of whom I think highly, said to me, that the foot note, of which complaint is made, was improper. Relying on his judgment, I promptly repaired to the Globe office and ordered that foot note to be stricken out so that it will not appear in the Congressional Globe. When I did that I had no idea that the gentleman [Mr. DAWES] cared what I did. A friend had said that I had done wrong, in his opinion, and that was sufficient reason for me to correct it.

I entertained no unkind opinion toward the gentleman from Massachusetts; up to the time of that speech I had no cause. But I believed honestly and sincerely that his speech was an unprovoked assault on me and my personal honor and integrity, and I replied to it as I thought it deserved. If I have misconstrued the speech and answered in an unjustifiable manner, I have already stated that I beg the pardon of the House, for it was not my intention to be guilty of any impropriety here.

That is all the explanation, Mr. Speaker, I have to make in regard to the matter. I have done simply what I believed to be right. It is possible that the minds of members may be so constituted as to differ in regard to the merits of the case, but according to the best judgment that it has pleased Providence to endow me with, I believe the construction that I put on it, that it was an unprovoked and unwarrantable assault on me, was a fair and just one. As such I resented it. If I could have put any other construction on it I would have done so. I had no desire for controversy—no desire for any unkind feeling, and no cause of complaint toward others. But if any one shall make any assault on me I expect to defend myself. I do not seek the reputation of a man of courage. I do not expect to get any popularity from it. It is not my style. I expect to act on the defensive, and in my intercourse with others I desire to receive and expect to extend to all the courtesy due from one friend to another.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. MALLORY. In order that I may do it, I ask the Clerk to read from the Globe of yesterday an extract from a speech made some days since by the member from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] and a colloquy in the course of that speech between him and myself.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"As respects the question of 'negro equality,' let me say to the gentleman that I do not think he ought to press it, considering his relations to his brethren in the South. I think the subject a somewhat delicate one for Democratic gentlemen to deal with."

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to have the gentleman explain that.

Mr. JULIAN. I will do so. We who are known as Republicans and unconditional Union men sometimes associate with negroes. They live among us, and of course we have dealings with them. But no such intimate relations exist between them and us as we find existing between them and the Democrats of the South. Continually, habitually, and as the result of a well-recognized law of social order, the slave mothers and slave masters of the South are brought on to the level of social equality in its most loathsome forms. In some of the rebel States I believe the number of mulattoes is nearly equal to the number of Democratic voters. In the State of Mississippi, if I am not mistaken, whenever you find an orthodox modern Democrat you will find a mulatto not very far off. The gentleman cannot deny this, unless he can show that these mulattoes sprouted up from the soil, or were rained down from the clouds, or reported their presence through some other miracle. This social equality between negro women and Anglo-Saxon Democrats is the natural consequence and necessary fruit of the institution which has proved itself to be the mother of treason and of all lesser abominations.

Mr. MALLORY. The Census Bureau establishes the fact that one sixth of the colored population of the North have white blood in their veins, while only one ninth of the slave population have white blood in them.

Mr. JULIAN. I have not examined the census tables as to the fact stated by the gentleman. It may be true, for I believe mulattoes more generally come into the northern States than those of a darker color, and of course their increase will be mulattoes. The gentleman is not at all relieved, however, by the white blood in the veins of these negroes in the North, for they have migrated from the South, bringing with them, perhaps, the blood of the gentleman from Kentucky, and other distinguished leaders of his party."

Mr. MALLORY. My reason, Mr. Speaker, for rising to trouble the House about this matter is to correct a habit which has grown, in my estimation, into a nuisance, and against which I propose to enter my solemn protest.

It is this: that members of this House permit others, as an act of courtesy, apparently, to interrupt them in the course of their speeches by questions to which they make, what appear to be at the time candid replies, and then, going to the office of the Globe, get from the reporter the notes of such colloquy and destroy those notes entirely, and substitute other and different answers from those uttered upon this floor.

The personal matter of that colloquy is nothing; the point is that the gentleman never uttered the reply which the Globe represents him as uttering to me upon this floor, and I state that the reply which now appears in the Globe as the reply to me by the member from Indiana is a forgery. It is not the reply which was made to me in that debate by the member from Indiana.

Mr. JULIAN. Will the gentleman allow me?
Mr. MALLORY. The member will excuse me.

Mr. JULIAN. I made those very remarks.
Mr. MALLORY. I have known in the course of my experience as a member of Congress gentlemen to let drop in the course of debate expressions which violate the parliamentary rules of this House, and in some instances, but rarely, has it occurred among gentlemen that expressions have been dropped which to some extent violated the rules of good breeding. But never before in my life have I known a member deliberately to write with his own hand an expression indecent, vulgar, unbecoming a member of this House, unbecoming a gentleman of course, and deliberately, without ever having uttered it, insert it in the Globe as a record of our proceeding when it never had an existence. That course has been left for the member from Indiana to take, I think for the first time in the history of this deliberative body. I am satisfied to leave the member in the possession of all the laurels which he can gather by such an act. If another kind of a man had uttered upon this floor what the gentleman, by this forgery interpolated in the Globe, has now asserted and held that he did use, I should have taken another and a different notice of it. I should not have noticed it in this Hall. The reason is apparent to gentlemen here why I have pursued this course toward the member from Indiana.

I think this custom has grown to be a nuisance; it ought to stop, an end ought to be put to it. When a member upon this floor, in reply to gentlemen here, utters deliberately what he then supposes to be his opinions, he should be held to that record, and not be allowed to enter the office of the Globe and destroy the notes of the reporter as to what he did say, and in his own handwriting substitute another reply than the one which he made upon the floor of this House.

What I say is proved by the notes which I hold in my hand. The gentleman, the member from Indiana, after leaving my remarks as the reporter of the Globe took them down, not only wrote his out in his own handwriting and sent them to the Globe office, but at the end of his own document, at the end of what he added, he inserted in brackets, "laughter," in his own handwriting. He has not only gone so far as to forge a reply to me, but he has insulted this House by deliberately perpetrating another forgery and making a record which the House laughed at. I have to say that if the member is satisfied with this matter, if he thinks he has added to his reputation, if he thinks he has gained anything which is desirable, and of which he, as a member of this House, ought to be proud, by this course, I leave him to the full enjoyment of it.

Mr. JULIAN. The practice is a very common one in this body for members in the haste of debate to make remarks which they afterwards correct in matters of verbiage, and frequently, where personal matters are not involved, as to matters of additional fact, by way of supplementary argument or illustration. I certainly did not in the case referred to go beyond the license which is well understood and universally recognized in this body. And I appeal now to the recollection of members of the House if the report of my remarks in the dialogue between the gentleman from Kentucky and myself is not, as contained in the Globe, the same substantially as the words spoken by me in the House. I did make, not only in substance but almost in the very words of the report in the Globe, the remarks that have been read by the Clerk. The variation is simply in some matters of formal expression, and not at all in the idea or in the fact, as I recollect what I said on that occasion. In the following extract, which the gentleman has read from the Globe, there is no ground whatever for his charge of forgery and interpolation. [Here Mr. JULIAN read the extract before read at the instance of Mr. MALLORY.]

I repeat that I did state, in substance and almost literally, the same matter which the gentleman seems to take as personal on this occasion, and I am sorry he does so. I have not availed myself of the usual license in this body in the statement of what I said.

I have seen, in the reports of proceedings of the House during this session, that sometimes where a gentleman has spoken five minutes he has appeared in the Globe as the author of a half hour's speech. Such cases are common here. I know that in the case of one of my colleagues, on the other side of the Hall, (and I do not mention it in the way of reproach to him,) in a debate between him and myself some time ago, remarks which occupied but a brief period were very considerably extended when reported for the Globe. Several pages were written out by himself in his own handwriting. I did not complain of it. He had a right to extend his remarks in the Globe as he thought fit.

Mr. VOORHEES. What gentleman from Indiana does the member allude to?

Mr. JULIAN. To the member from the fourth district of Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] Gentlemen know this to be the ordinary practice of the House. And the gentleman from Kentucky, in assailing me as he has done this morning, and in charging me with forgery, simply shows that the remarks which I made in regard to amalgamation were offensive to him, and had an offensive application. At least I can see no other explanation of the feeling he exhibits.

As to my interpolating the word "laughter" in the report, I certainly did no such thing. I have no recollection of doing otherwise than following literally the manuscript of the reporter, and I am sure I did so. If such a thing was done by me, it certainly was not done intentionally. It would be morally impossible for me to forge the word "laughter," and put it in parenthesis for the purpose of securing an advantage in debate. I do not believe even the gentleman from Kentucky would do that, and I know that I am not mean enough to have done it. All I desired was simply to give the substance of my remarks, wishing to stand by that without any clap-trap in the matter.

Having answered the member from Kentucky I do not know that I have anything further to say, except that I am responsible for what was contained in the Globe report, and I have not been at all frightened by anything the gentleman has said in relation to the matter.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in reply.

There was no objection.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I understand, I suppose, what the member means by his personal responsibility. I suppose every gentleman here understands the member's personal responsibility. I made a charge this morning which the member has undertaken to meet by claiming as a right that a member of this House can take the notes of his remarks from the reporters of the Globe and change and modify them as he chooses. I understand that in some order or rule adopted by this House, or perhaps in some law referring to the publication of our debates in the Globe, the privilege is directly conceded to every member of the House to change the phraseology of his speech so that he does not change the substance of it.

I have to some slight extent exercised it myself, but very rarely; but never have I, and I will say that never has any gentleman who has a proper sense of the responsibility under which he rests here, undertaken to change a colloquy which occurred between himself and another gentleman upon the floor of this House without the consent and concurrence of that gentleman. I make that statement without fear of contradiction. No gentleman would undertake to do it. No gentleman would think of doing it. And I now make the assertion, and if any gentleman in the House doubts its truth, I call on those gentlemen around me who heard me to corroborate my statement that that portion of the extract which makes a personal allusion to "the gentleman from Kentucky" was never uttered on this floor. It was never uttered on this floor, and its insertion in the Globe by that member is a forgery.

My complaint is that the Globe states what he did not say, but what he wrote out afterwards. When he read from the Globe to show what he said, he read from a forged document. And he read from that to show the House what he said. Where is the original? Where are the notes of the reporter? They went, the reporter says, into the hands of the member from Indiana. They cannot be found. There was replaced in their hands, instead of their notes as taken down, the manuscript of the member from Indiana, and the manuscript report of the reporter, the only documentary evidence there is in the case, cannot be found anywhere. It was delivered to him, but it was not delivered up by him. Where is it? It will show what you did say, as well as what you did not say. Where, I repeat, are the reporter's notes? They have not got them; they are not on file in the Globe office. There are sheets here in your handwriting, paged and numbered and marked, one after another, substituted for the reporter's notes, and there is no possible way of proving what the member says by referring to that record, which, in the law or resolution establishing the Globe as the report of the debates, were intended as the proof for all time of what transpired in this House. I cannot appeal to that proof; I cannot produce it; but I can appeal to the memory of gentlemen around me who heard the member to corroborate my statement that this remark which is published in the Globe from the manuscript of the member from Indiana, put in by himself, "perhaps the blood of the gentleman from Kentucky" and what follows, is a forgery.

Mr. JULIAN. I uttered that language substantially, if not literally.

Mr. MALLORY. You never uttered any such language.

Mr. JULIAN. It is false. [Cries of "Order!"] Mr. WADSWORTH, (as understood by the reporter,) It is a lie, and the member knows it to be a lie. [Cries of "Order!" and confusion.]

Mr. MALLORY. It was false then and is false now. [Shouts of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Both the gentlemen from Kentucky and the gentleman from Indiana are out of order.

Mr. COX. I call the member from Indiana to order, and ask that his words may be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The words will be taken down.

The Clerk read the words "It is false."

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a question of order. Both gentlemen from Kentucky as well as the gentleman from Indiana are out of order, and I ask that their words may also be taken down.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. That point of order comes too late.

Mr. NORTON. Not at all. I called the gentlemen from Kentucky to order at the time, and said that their language was not proper to be used.

The SPEAKER. The language of both gentlemen from Kentucky will be taken down.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a lie, and the member knows it to be a lie."

"Mr. MALLORY. It was false then and is false now."

Mr. MALLORY. The Speaker stated that the gentleman from Kentucky had the floor, and I had commenced my remarks before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NORTON] made his point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois states that he called the gentleman from Kentucky to order in time. The confusion does not prevent the gentleman from the exercise of his right to have the rules of the House enforced. He states on his veracity that he called the gentleman to order in time.

Mr. NOBLE. I submit that in order to be recognized the gentleman from Illinois should have persevered so as to have obtained the ear of the Chair, and that not having done so until the gentleman from Kentucky had again by leave of the Chair commenced his remarks, it is entirely too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair finds nothing in the rules which compels a member to persist in repeated calls to order. The language of the rule is that when the Speaker or a member calls a member to order he must take his seat. The gentleman from Illinois states that he called the gentleman from Kentucky to order while he was still speaking. The Chair has always ruled that when a member stated on his veracity that he made the point of order in time he would receive it.

Mr. NOBLE. Let me inquire whether the Chair decides that the gentleman from Illinois is properly recognized in his seat as calling the gentleman from Kentucky to order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the rule read, which will answer the question.

Mr. PRUYN. I have a point to suggest that will make all further proceedings in the matter unnecessary.

Mr. NORTON. I want first to make a statement in regard to the fact involved. While the gentleman from Kentucky was speaking, and as soon as I heard him say that the gentleman from Indiana had lied, I called him to order. I regarded those words as improper to be used by any gentleman upon this floor. I myself immediately called the gentleman from Kentucky to order. I asked that the words be taken down. I do not see why I should have repeatedly called the gentleman from Kentucky to order as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has settled that point. The gentleman from Illinois has complied with the rules. The Chair will now hear the point of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to state in regard to this matter that I heard the call to order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NORTON] both called. I think that the call of the gentleman from Illinois was subsequent to that of the gentleman from Ohio. I suppose, after the Chair had the point of the gentleman from Ohio under consideration, that the gentleman from Illinois had no right to make his point.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the language as taken down by the reporter. If the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois was made after the one of the gentleman from Ohio, it would have to be reserved for action on it by the House till the prior one was decided.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Mr. WADSWORTH. The member states what is a lie, and he knows it to be a lie."

"Mr. MALLORY. It was false then and it is false now."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the rule.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"61. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate; if there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House; and if the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House."

Mr. COX. What was the language of the gentleman from Indiana?

The CLERK. "It is false."

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the remarks of the three gentlemen are out of order.

Mr. COX. I move that the gentleman from Kentucky be permitted to proceed in order.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 31.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I only want my right to speak vindicated. I do not know that I have anything more to say. It is a great thing to know that one has rights here which he can exercise if he chooses. In order to show the House that I am not only anxious to proceed in order, but to give evidence of my anxiety at all times to do so, I state that I regret violating the rules of the House, and I apologize to the House for any language which I may have uttered to-day which violates its rules. I rose to protest against a practice which I remarked had grown into a nuisance, and which I considered had been exhibited in its most offensive form by the member from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN.]

An exhibition has taken place which I had no desire to provoke, but which I could not help provoking, I suppose, considering the character of the material I had to deal with. I am at all times ready to extend to any gentleman courtesy, and to observe the rules of the House whenever I address it; but, sir, I have never yet inflicted upon the House or the country a forged speech. That may be in order; that may be right; but I never intend to do it, and I cannot do it. It would be impossible for me to do it.

Not only is it true that the member from Indiana, in the remarks to which I have alluded and to which I have called the attention of the House, has been guilty of forgery in palming upon this House and the country remarks which he never uttered upon this floor, but he has gone further, and has taken the pains, we are to infer from all the circumstances of the case, to destroy all the legal evidence by which he could be convicted of that forgery, thereby piling up crime on crime, adding larceny to forgery, making an offensive list of crimes as he heaps up his pile. This charge may be out of order, but it is true.

The SPEAKER. The remarks are certainly out of order.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I beg pardon of the Chair and of the House. I had doubts myself whether it was in order, and as the Chair decides that it is not, if there is any other reparation which I can make to the House, I am ready to make it—for telling the truth.

But this forgery of the member from Indiana is not confined to the clause to which I have called the attention of the House. It runs through the whole colloquy between the member from Indiana and myself. What he should have regarded and what I regarded as the comparatively decent part of that colloquy so far as the member from Indiana is concerned, has been altered by him as distinctly as that part of it to which I have called the attention of the House. Three or four or five full sheets, in the member's own handwriting, have been substituted for the sheets of reports which the reporters of the Globe took down, and in which were contained what did transpire in this House; and those sheets of the reporters are gone, have vanished, disappeared. Where they are I cannot tell. When last heard from they were in the hands of the member from Indiana, and I suppose if they were considered in law as valuable matter, and a recovery of them sought, that an astute lawyer might force him to produce the sheets or account for their absence or disappearance. I do not think we have that power in this House. If we had, I should move that it be exercised in the case of the member from Indiana. I would like to see the screws applied to him, and I would like to have him forced to tell the House what he has done with the report of the reporters of the Globe, for which he has substituted his own manuscript sheets.

I wanted to know what he did say, and I anxiously sought to find out what he did say by consulting the veritable record made by the reporters. I called at the office and made diligent search with the reporters, and the report which they made was not there. They stated that they had given it up to the gentleman from Indiana, and that he had returned in its place these sheets in his own handwriting which I now show to the House.

I said I had but few remarks to make, and I do not know that it is necessary that I should say anything more. I am satisfied with the matter so far as I am concerned in it. I believe the members of the House are tired of it, and I leave the matter with them.

Mr. JULIAN. One single remark more. The particular complaint which the gentleman makes is founded on this statement as reported by the Globe:

"The gentleman is not at all relieved, however, by the white blood in the veins of these negroes in the North, for they have migrated from the South, bringing with them, perhaps, the blood of the gentleman from Kentucky, and other distinguished leaders of his party. [Laughter.]"

The gentleman from Kentucky deliberately denies that I made that statement, and brands it as a forgery in this House. Now, sir, I recollect distinctly that I used those identical words which have so offended the gentleman, and which he says I never uttered; and I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from Michigan, and other members of this House near me to sustain my assertion and brand as false the charges of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MALLORY. Is that remark of the gentleman from Indiana in order?

The SPEAKER. What remark?

Mr. MALLORY. That what I have said is false. That is a cheap way he has of insulting me.

Mr. JULIAN. I said I would appeal to members to show that it was false.

Mr. MALLORY. To "brand it as false," was the expression.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regards the remark as out of order; and also part of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky were out of order. But when the House gives unanimous consent to a gentleman to make a personal explanation the House must expect, as a matter of course, that some remarks of a personal character will be made. The Chair therefore does not generally interrupt a gentleman on such occasions, but prefers to wait for a member of the House to call him to order. It was for that reason that the Chair has not, therefore, thus far called either gentleman to order. The gentleman from Indiana now yields to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. LONGYEAR.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I object to any more witnesses being produced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has a right to yield for explanation.

Mr. COX. This is not a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in that nature.

Mr. COX. On the part of the gentleman from Michigan?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. COX. I do not wish to appeal from the Chair; but I hope the Chair will reconsider its decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot reconsider it, as he is clear that the gentleman from Indiana has the right to yield.

Mr. LONGYEAR. I do not wish to enter into this controversy, but as the gentleman from Indiana has called on me I will state what my distinct recollection is. I was paying particular attention to the colloquy between the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Kentucky; and I do recollect distinctly the gentleman from Indiana using the identical language, or at least substantially the language, made use of in the reference to the gentleman from Kentucky. In corroboration of my memory in this respect, I also recollect distinctly conversing with my colleague, who sits beside me, [Mr. DRIGGS,] on the occasion, and also after the adjournment of the House that day in regard to that particular statement of the gentleman from Indiana. I cannot be mistaken in the fact.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will do me the favor to say what he recollects of the matter.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to respond, although I do not desire to do so. I remember the remarks which have been read as having been made at the time; for I thought at the time, and think I remarked, that they were quite rude. [Laughter.]

Mr. JULIAN. I call on the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] to state his recollection of the matter.

Mr. DRIGGS. As the gentleman has called upon me I will say that I can indorse what my colleague [Mr. LONGYEAR] has stated. I remember it distinctly.

Mr. MALLORY. I make the point of order that the proof in this case is the reporter's manuscript, which is in the hands of the gentleman from Indiana. Let him produce it. It went into his hands. It is out of order to be proving in this way what was said by members.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House to determine, not for the Chair.

Mr. DRIGGS. I was going to say that I remember distinctly the fact that my colleague [Mr. LONGYEAR] remarked to me that he thought that rather sharp, when Mr. JULIAN spoke of mulattoes bringing to the North the blood of southern men. We conversed about it at the time, and on our way home after the adjournment.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, there are half a dozen other gentlemen around me who tell me that their recollection is the same as that of those who have spoken. But I will not consume the time of the House in calling other witnesses. I simply want to say that I have branded as a slander the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky that I have been guilty of forgery. I arraign him and convict him on the evidence of men who heard me use the identical words attributed to me by the Globe reporters, and throw back into the teeth of the member—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is out of order. The Chair feels that he cannot allow these personalities. If gentlemen do not rise to questions of order it is the duty of the Chair to arrest personalities.

Mr. JULIAN. I will proceed then.

Mr. COX. I ask the Chair to have the rule read prescribing the course of proceeding when a member is called to order.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty when a member is called to order to take his seat.

Mr. ORTH. I move that my colleague be allowed to proceed in order.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JULIAN. The House I think will understand what I meant to say, and what I did say. I desire to make one further remark. The gentleman from Kentucky refers to these pages of the reporter's manuscript. Now, the gentleman, who is an old and experienced member of this House, knows that nothing is more common than for a member to take the pages of his reported speech and substitute other pages in his own handwriting, withholding the manuscript of the reporter. When I took this manuscript of the reporter for the Globe, which I found reported me imperfectly and needed much interlineation, I asked him if I was at liberty on looking it over to substitute my own report for some of the pages; in other words, whether I would be allowed to retain those pages and write out others in my own hand in their place. He said I could do so if I would make the same paging at the top. I did so in accordance with what I understand to be a well-recognized custom in this body.

I do not know where those pages are. It is sufficient now to assert and prove as I have done by the testimony of several gentlemen about me that what is reported in the Globe is substantially what I did say. The gentleman cannot dodge the point by saying that the Globe report is different from my spoken words when gentlemen about me say it was substantially if not literally the same. If I saw fit as a favor to the printer to write out one or two pages in my own hand to make it more legible as well as accurate neither the gentleman nor anybody else has any right to complain. I assure him again that the identical words I used which allude to him personally are reported in the Globe, and that all of my remarks, both as to fact and argument, are reported with substantial if not literal accuracy. If the gentleman does not believe me let him consult the Globe reporters. I know they will not contradict me. If I can find the fragments of sheets which I threw aside I will show from the handwriting of the reporters themselves that I used the identical language which the gentleman says I forged. I will make search for those pages among some rubbish in my committee-room if any more certainty in this matter is demanded.

As to any further remarks of the gentleman I have only to say that it is not complained of by him that I interfered in any way with the report of his own remarks as published in the Globe. No such allegation as that is made. Under such circumstances the gentleman charges me with forging, with adding larceny to forgery, with piling crime upon crime. Well, sir, if after what has been said he still persists in these charges, and sees fit to write himself down a black and ruffian, I hand him over—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is out of order.

Mr. JULIAN. I had but little more to add on that point, and I will desist.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have read a sentence from page 72 of the Manual in relation to the point of order raised a few moments since, and on which his decision was doubted by gentlemen on the right of the Chair.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"While a member is occupying the floor he may yield it to another for explanation of the pending measure as well as for personal explanation."

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will see, therefore, that in yielding for explanations in regard to the controversy now before the House the gentleman from Indiana was strictly in order.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to say a word or two further, with the consent of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the gentleman from Vermont will not insist on that at this moment.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well, I will not object.

Mr. MALLORY. My recollection is clear and distinct, and I was listening very closely at the time, that the member from Indiana used no such language as is reported in the Globe. He has attempted to prove that he did by calling on gentlemen around him to state their recollection of the language he used on that occasion. None of those gentlemen but one say that he uttered the words that are reported in the Globe to have been used by him. Their recollection is that he either uttered these words, or substantially what is reported in the Globe. None of them, except the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and I was a little astonished at the accuracy of his hearing and the accuracy of his memory—none of them except that gentleman say that the member from Indiana used the precise language reported in the Globe.

A construction will be put on what a member says by one gentleman in one way, and by another gentleman in another way. Constructions may differ and do differ. You may remember substantially what he did say, and you may differ as to the language. The language is the matter in point here. They say that the tenor of what the member said is reported in the Globe. There are gentlemen around me who listened attentively and closely to what the member from Indiana uttered. I appealed to them before I undertook what I have done, and there is not one to whom I put the question whose recollection is not clear that no such language was used.

I call on the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] who listened to every word that was uttered, to say whether the member from Indiana used the words reported in the Globe.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I was sitting in my seat and listened to the colloquy that passed, and which is now alluded to, and I have no recollection that there was uttered the language indicated. I do not think that any such language was used applying the charge to any one, or that any language was used charging, or stating in any way, that the blood of the gentleman from Kentucky, or any member, was as was charged. Now, I can only say that I listened to it at the time, and my attention is called to it now by this discussion, and I have no such recollection of any such remark, and I think I would have noticed it if made, as I sat near the gentleman from Kentucky, and between him and the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MALLORY. I call on the gentleman from Michigan, whom I did not consult, for his recollection.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan. I listened attentively to what was said, and, sitting between them, I had a fair opportunity for hearing. I must say, sir, that I heard no personal allusion by the gentleman from Indiana as to the blood of the gentleman from Kentucky. I think I can say positively there was no such language used.

Mr. MALLORY. I now call on the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] who was sitting by my side and listened to every word of the colloquy.

Mr. GRISWOLD. My remembrance of the remark of the gentleman from Indiana on the occasion referred to is that some general expression of the kind attributed to him was made. Certainly no direct application was made to the gentleman from Kentucky. I feel quite certain I should have regarded that as a personal matter, and expected the gentleman from Kentucky to have so regarded it and resented it at once. I certainly did not understand the language to be directed to the gentleman from Kentucky at all, but some general remark of the gentleman from Indiana:

Mr. MALLORY. I now call on the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] who also heard every word of that colloquy.

Mr. A. MYERS. Will the gentleman from Indiana be allowed to call in rebutting testimony?

The SPEAKER. That will depend on whether the House will give him the opportunity to reply.

Mr. SCHENCK rose.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman has any testimony to give I will hear him.

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not hear the remarks; I was in the cloak-room at the time.

Mr. MALLORY. I would be glad to have the gentleman's testimony.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to give way that I may send to the Clerk's desk to be read a portion of the record of the proceedings of the Pickwick Club. It is but a page or two, and from the "Posthumous Papers" of that distinguished society. It furnishes a good precedent for the present proceedings, and may help to compose the disagreements of the House.

Mr. MALLORY. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. PRUYN. I happened, at the time referred to, to occupy a seat in this part of the House near to the Speaker. I turned my chair in such a way that I might hear all that was said by the gentleman from Indiana. I heard very distinctly what was said by the gentleman from Kentucky. No such language as that contained in the paragraph about the blood of the gentleman from Kentucky was made use of by the gentleman from Indiana within my hearing, and I think I heard every word he said. I listened attentively, and was sitting in front of him, and if any such expression had been made use of by him I could not have failed to hear it.

Mr. MALLORY. I now call upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER,] who listened to that debate.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I can only say that at the time this debate occurred, I left my own seat and took a position where I might be able to hear what transpired between the parties. My recollection squares precisely with that of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN,] and the gentleman from Indiana did not, according to my recollection, utter the language which is found in the published proceedings in the Globe; nor was the sentiment itself reduced to any such shape as to make it a personal insult to the gentleman from Kentucky, as is the case with the remark as published in the Globe, and presented here to-day. I cannot believe, I do not believe the gentleman from Indiana would ever have uttered that sentiment anywhere else in the world except under lock and key or under a safeguard.

Mr. A. MYERS. I object to witnesses giving their opinions. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. I call upon one gentleman more, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BLISS,] who heard that debate.

Mr. BLISS. The testimony I have to give bearing upon the issue before the House is this: during the colloquy between those two gentlemen, for the purpose of more surely hearing the interesting remarks which were passing I took a seat near the Speaker. I listened to that part of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana in which he spoke of the amalgamation of the Anglo-Saxon and the African blood at the South. I heard what he said with reference to the conduct of the people of the region of the gentleman from Kentucky. I had a suspicion that in the warmth of the speaker's passion he would apply the subject personally to the gentleman from Kentucky, and I was waiting to hear it. I listened to all the remarks made upon that subject, and discovered that the gentleman from Indiana had the prudence to avoid a personal imputation. I left the subject with that impression, I have it now, and I have no doubt my impression is absolutely correct.

Mr. MALLORY. Now, sir, I end this matter, so far as I am concerned, with the single declaration that the member from Indiana has in his own possession the only absolute and conclusive proof about the matter in contest between him and myself. He can produce it, and show that he is guiltless of the charge I make against him. He has the notes in his possession. By producing the reporter's notes he can show whether the expression was uttered or not. If it was, I retract my charge; if not, I insist upon it.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire to say one word further.

Mr. COFFROTH. I object.

Mr. JULIAN. The reporter concurs with me.

Mr. COFFROTH. If the gentleman has the notes in his possession, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. JULIAN. Before I proceed to say what I desire to add to my remarks, I call upon my colleague from the Tippecanoe district to state his recollection of this discussion.

Mr. ORTH. I was in the neighborhood of these gentlemen during the colloquy.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I object to any further statements in reference to what transpired on that occasion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman having just obtained unanimous consent to speak has the right to occupy one hour, and he can yield to any gentleman for a personal explanation relating to the matter under discussion. The gentleman from the eighth district of Indiana will proceed.

Mr. ORTH. I was in the immediate vicinity of my colleague, [Mr. JULIAN,] but I would not pretend to-day, nor would I have pretended an hour after that colloquy had occurred, to attempt to relate the exact words which either of those gentlemen used. I have a little too much experience as a lawyer to attempt to repeat the language used, especially after several days have transpired. So all the information that I can give is the impression I received at the time. That impression is still on my mind, and I will give it to the House for what it is worth. The impression made on my mind at the time was that my colleague [Mr. JULIAN] did use language referring directly and personally to the gentleman from Kentucky, and I felt, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated, that it was rather rude. As to stating his precise words, I am unable to do so.

Mr. JULIAN. I will call only one other witness, the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. DEMING.]

Mr. DEMING. Mr. Speaker, my attention was particularly called to the discussion between the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Indiana from the fact that I regarded it as unsuitable to a miscellaneous audience, and therefore I cast up my eye to the gallery for the purpose of seeing whether there were any ladies present during the discussion. I paid particular attention to the part of the colloquy which is now in dispute. But I labor under the same disadvantage as the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.] The question before the House seems to be whether the language as published in the Globe was the identical language used by the gentleman from Indiana. I have a distinct recollection of his ideas, and could narrate them. I could detail them. But it is totally impossible for me to say what the precise terms were which the gentleman from Indiana used. My own recollection is that there was not so much of a personal character in the argument as appears in the columns of the Globe. But in that I may possibly be mistaken.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, the member from Kentucky has succeeded, it will be conceded on all sides of the House, in proving that several members on that side did not hear me use the language in question. Now, I am willing to agree to that, and I am willing to leave the case in that attitude. It having been proved that I did use it, by gentlemen whose attention was called to it, and who say that they heard me, and it having been proved by gentlemen on the other side that they did not hear me, I submit that the case on my side is fully made out.

I will say further that if the gentleman from Kentucky desires any further proof, and pretends still that I am guilty of a forgery, I will commend him to the Globe reporters who took down the identical words used. Let him ask them whether I used those words or not. I will state further that since this discussion commenced I have succeeded in finding a portion of the report of my remarks on that occasion which was thrown aside and substituted by my own manuscript; but I have not succeeded in finding the whole of the scraps thus laid aside. When I find them I will use them; and they will show, written by the reporter himself in his blue ink, that I did speak of the gentleman from Kentucky in the connection which is shown in the Globe report; that I did say the negroes referred to came from the South bringing with them in their veins the blood perhaps of the gentleman from Kentucky and other leaders of his party. When I produce that report it will show what the reporter would now testify, if he had the right to testify, and which is confirmed by numbers of gentlemen on this side of the House who heard me use this language. To all that I add my own positive and distinct recollection of the language, for I was there, and I spoke it. I know I cannot possibly be deceived, and I place my word against that of the member from Kentucky and his witnesses in this matter. As to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER,] who stated a little while ago that I did not use the expression, because I would not have dared to do it on this floor, I have only to say in reply to that taunt that I suppose he speaks from his own feelings, and imputes to me that cowardice which belongs to himself. I leave the question where it lies.

Mr. PIKE proceeded to address the House on the reciprocity treaty, but yielded to Mr. JULIAN, who said: I ask the member from Kentucky if he will allow the reporter's manuscript showing the words I did use to be read now?

Mr. MALLORY. If the member from Indiana alludes to me, of course I am anxious to have it read.

Mr. JULIAN. I have found this portion of the report in the handwriting of the reporter, and I send it up to be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Come from the South, and have brought with them the blood of the gentleman from Kentucky in their veins. [Laughter.]"

Mr. PRUYN. Gentlemen.

Mr. JULIAN. The language is, "the gentleman from Kentucky." It is here in the very words which the gentleman charges as being a forgery, and the word "laughter" is there, too, in parentheses as I have it. I ask the gentleman, therefore, to take back what he has stated.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, this is in the handwriting of the reporter, who says it is his report of what was said. I certainly have no recollection of hearing any such language uttered by the member from Indiana, and my response as published in the Globe to what the gentleman did say on that occasion, as I understood him, shows that I could have heard no such language uttered as that published in the Globe, and which is here in the reporter's manuscript. I understood the member from Indiana as speaking of persons in the South, and not of "the gentleman from Kentucky." That was my understanding, but I see the reporter for the Globe took down his remarks differently, and as his manuscript has been produced here, and as that manuscript contains the language referred to, I of course retract the charge I made of forgery. I should never have made the charge if I had not been supported in my recollection by the recollection of other gentlemen, who were sitting not very far from the member from Indiana and listening to his remarks. I understood him to make his charge against southerners as a class, and that is the reason of my reply to him in the language which I used. If I had understood him to use the language which it seems he did use, if I had understood him to apply it to me personally, as it seems he did apply it, my reply would have been very different. That is as far as I shall allude to the matter for the present. The member has relieved himself from the charge of forgery, and I retract the charge.

Mr. JULIAN. I hope the gentlemen on the other side are now satisfied that their recollection of my remarks was not precisely accurate. I hope they are satisfied.

Mr. MALLORY. I merely wish to ask the member from Indiana whether he has the part of the reporter's manuscript which precedes this, and which may make this remark apply to a class. I will ask him whether the manuscript of the reporter is distinctly "the gentleman from Kentucky," or "the gentlemen from Kentucky."

Mr. JULIAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has retracted his charge; but I will answer him that it is the gentleman from Kentucky. The report of the reporter shows that I alluded to him.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to see the portion which precedes this. I am exceedingly anxious to know whether my memory should have deceived me so much as it seems to have done.

Mr. JULIAN. If I can find it—as I have tried to—I will exhibit it to the gentleman from Kentucky. If he has any doubt on the subject, I hope he will consult the Globe reporter.

Mr. MALLORY. I have consulted the Globe reporter, who I have every reason to believe is an honorable gentleman, and he says the language reported is the language used by the member. I give the member from Indiana the benefit of that.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

The House next proceeded, as the business in order, to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 2) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, 1854, on which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the resolution by substituting for it the following:

Whereas by the reciprocity treaty, concluded the 5th day of June, and ratified on the 11th day of September, 1854, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain, for the period of ten years from the date at which it should come into operation, and further, until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties should give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same, each of the high contracting parties, according to the provisions of article fifth of said treaty, being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of said term of ten years, or at any time afterwards, and thereby annul and abrogate said treaty; and whereas it has become desirable to terminate said treaty in the manner therein provided for, as its terms no longer appear reciprocally beneficial or satisfactory: With a view, therefore, that steps be taken for the termination of the said treaty of the 5th of June, 1854, in the mode prescribed in its fifth article, at the earliest practicable period therein provided for, and that the attention of the Governments of both countries may be directed to the adoption of all proper measures for an amicable adjustment of any matters of difference or dispute which may remain or arise in consequence of the termination of said treaty, Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to give to the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland the notice required by the fifth article of the said reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854, for the termination of the same.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, the proposition now before the House is to clothe the Executive with authority to give to Great Britain a notice of our desire to terminate the reciprocity treaty. The section requiring this notice stipulates that the treaty "shall remain in force ten years from the date at which it may come into operation," and that "at the end of said term of ten years, or any time thereafter," either party is at liberty to give notice to the other of its desire to terminate it, and the treaty shall terminate in one year thereafter.

Some question has been made about the propriety of passing this resolution now because it is said to be premature. But I think the objection not well taken. The treaty was ratified September 11, 1854, and the President's proclamation was made March 16, 1855. But the legislation called for by the treaty was all retroactive on the part of Congress and of the provinces, so that when the 11th of September next shall arrive, this treaty will have been in force the full term of ten years.

The other view of the matter would protract the workings of this treaty six months, and make the ten years of the treaty expire March 16, 1865. In either event this Congress would be called upon to give the notice, and the only question would be whether it should be done at this session or the next.

I confess I am impatient of delay. I desire this treaty to draw its last breath as soon as possible. Had it much longer to live in order to die a natural death, if that be not paradoxical, I should be disposed to use violence and destroy a life which, in my judgment, has been productive of so much injury. It was a creature of mistaken views and of expectations which had no basis in fact. Its workings have been a continuous and protracted disappointment. It has achieved no considerable result which was predicted for it, and I ask the attention of the House for a short time while I exhibit its utter failure in all particulars which should render a commercial arrangement with a foreign country desirable to us.

If I could believe that the treaty would not be continued when it is demonstrated that as a bargain between commercial communities it is utterly unprofitable to us I should be quite content. But I fear that when this has been done the more formidable question will have to be met as to the expediency of the thing, even if commercially desirable. It will be asked whether the condition of the country does not demand the sacrifice a continuance of the treaty would enforce. It is this question lying behind the other that I consider much the more important to be determined in order to insure action. One can deal readily with facts and figures. They are susceptible of working out conclusions that cannot be gained. But other considerations that depend, it may be, on apprehensions only half confessed, elude the grasp like a hidden disease, and cannot be measured and controlled. They vary in importance according to the mood of the person indulging them, and arguments that are convincing at one time are of no account at another.

I propose to address myself to both views of this important matter, as I am firmly convinced that just and proper political considerations demand of us the abrogation of this treaty far more imperatively than even the cries of oppressed trade.

The first question for the House to consider is whether the business interests of the country would be promoted by the abrogation of the treaty.

If the treaty be abrogated the provinces will regulate their trade with us according to the general laws governing trade with other countries. I know this would not have been the case formerly. There was a long series of years when the policy of Great Britain was to keep the provinces for her own use. She chose to manufacture for them, and she wished to convey their products in her own ships. She planted them and protected them, and as an equivalent for the expenses incurred, determined to have whatever profit might arise from their trade. The statute of 1660 provided that "no merchandise whatever shall be imported into or exported from any colonies of Great Britain in Asia, Africa, or America, except in British vessels with British masters, and manned by at least three quarters British sailors." This law remained in force for more than a hundred and fifty years, and whoever will examine our earlier treaties with them, beginning with Jay's treaty in 1794, and running through subsequent treaties and conventions, will see with what jealousy the Government guarded this colonial trade.

But the home pressure on the British Government changed its policy. The manufacturing interest, which demanded laws for its protection when it was feeble, had outgrown the necessity for such legislative aid, and sought free and unrestricted trade with the world. By one step after another the colonies were relieved of the restrictions placed upon them, until now their connection with the mother country is little more than nominal. We should bear this fact in mind when we are discussing the propriety of the proposed measures. It is not whether by abrogating this treaty we shall throw obstacles in the way of commercial intercourse, as would have been the case formerly upon the abrogation of a special commercial arrangement with them, but whether by abrogating this treaty we shall place our trade and commerce with the provinces upon the same footing as that with Great Britain.

And I desire the House to consider this question as one of very considerable importance. The figures of this trade are large even in comparison with the enormous sums to which we are becoming ing accustomed. It cannot be otherwise hereafter. These provinces, if combined, would in population, extent of territory, abundance of resources, intelligence of inhabitants, and general thrift, be an empire of no inconsiderable importance. Their contiguity to our own markets will bring them here to sell their productions, and we shall exchange commodities with them to a much greater extent than with any equal population elsewhere. For some years our trade with them has been considerably more than our whole foreign trade at the time of the formation of our Constitution.

Sir, those who effected this treaty had been at work upon it for a number of years. A similar proposition had been made by Canada alone and rejected. Like terms had been offered as to the fisheries and refused. But this scheme, by being more comprehensive, brought in a larger number of supporters, and thus obtained sufficient strength to force itself upon the country. I have familiarized myself with the history of the negotiations that led to the treaty, and as a mode of testing the value of the plan thus persistently urged upon us, I propose to examine the expectations of those who advocated its adoption. Let us see what they attempted to do, and then we may judge better whether they have succeeded.

Among the first of these purposes was an intention to benefit the fisheries. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD,] yesterday, in his elaborate and able speech, presented that subject as one of first importance. The treaty itself recapitulates the difficulties and misunderstandings in relation to the fisheries, and gives that as one reason for its formation. At the time of the making of this treaty we were acting under the convention of 1818. You will recollect that the treaty of 1783 provided the proper basis upon which this matter should stand. The language of that treaty is very forcible. It says:

"The people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank and all other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish."

Thus the inhabitants of both countries were to have the same rights in these fisheries. But the commissioners who executed the convention of 1818, for some reason, and for what I never could understand, yielded those valuable rights without any consideration whatever, and that convention stipulated that we on our side renounced forever—for that is the language of the convention—"all right to take and cure fish within three marine miles of the coast, bays, creeks, and harbors of the provinces," except in certain specified localities, in Newfoundland, Labrador, and the Magdalen Islands.

It was a very hard bargain for us to make, and the construction put upon it by the British authorities subsequently made it still harder, for they contended that these three marine miles should be measured, not from the indent of the coast, but from imaginary lines stretching from headland to headland along the coast.

Much difficulty occurred, many vessels were seized, and this treaty attempted to obviate these difficulties for our benefit. The reciprocity treaty opened our home market to foreign fish on the same terms as our own. For this grant to foreign fishermen we gained certain privileges in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and along the shores of the provinces. The odious three-mile restriction imposed by the convention of 1818 was removed. Our fishermen could go anywhere except up the rivers, and were allowed to cure fish upon the shores. Large benefits were expected. It was supposed that our fishermen having maintained a long contest against what seemed bad odds would now, upon equal terms, compete with great profit to themselves with the provincials engaged in this trade. How is it? We have now nearly ten years' experience of this new order of things. Has it benefited those engaged in the trade? This is a practical question to be decided by the merchants themselves. They are intelligent and know their own interests. I hold in my hand several letters from gentlemen largely interested in the fishing business. They were written to me since this proposition to repeal the treaty was introduced, and are conclusive to my mind upon this branch of the subject.

One of these correspondents is among the largest fishermen in New England. He is a highly intelligent gentleman and "knows whereof he affirms." He says:

"The reciprocity treaty operates against the fishing interest. It would be an advantage to the fishing interest to have it abolished, with an understanding that a tariff should be put on foreign fish. The privilege of fishing in-shore in common with the English is duly appreciated by us who are in the business, as the annoyance and loss of vessels under the three-mile restriction was troublesome and hard to bear. But things have entirely changed since the treaty was made. In 1854 the duties were only nominal, and they were so small that it did not make much difference whether they were continued or not; and for the purpose of getting clear of the three-mile restriction we thought we had better let foreign fish come in. But although just now the importation is checked on account of the high price of exchange, as soon as that resumes its usual course free foreign fish will drive us entirely out of the market. Salt is now worth with them $1 50 per hoghead; with us, $4 50. Cod-lines, leads, duck, nets, everything that we use on board of our vessels, and the materials of which our vessels are built, cost about in the same proportion, or nearly so. All of us thought, in 1854, that fighting had ceased, and tariffs were among the things that had gone by. This rebellion brings about a new order of things. With us it is taxes, taxes. While we are taxed on everything that we see, smell, or taste, and very properly, too, should the provincials have our markets open to them and invited to come in without taxation? It is most certainly for the interest of the fisheries that the treaty should be repealed."

Another gentleman engaged in the same business writes:

"Our vessels fish mostly on the Banks, which is outside the three-mile limits. About all the benefit we derive from the present arrangement is to get bait in-shore and mackereling near the land in the bay of Chaleurs. But the advantage is trifling compared with the injuries received from foreign competition. In this town the business has greatly declined in consequence of the treaty. From 1840 to 1850 we had seventy sail of fishermen, but now we have not half that number. About three quarters of the fish caught by the provincials are suited to our market, and none other, and of course must come here for sale."

I have other letters upon the subject from equally intelligent sources, all coming to the same conclusion, but expressing it in a more general way. The sentiment expressed in these letters is, so far as I know, universal among those engaged in this business.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House particularly to this testimony, because the Committee on Commerce seem to have fallen into the error that the benefits to the fisheries make up somewhat for the loss occasioned by the treaty to other branches of trade. Two years since Mr. Galt, then minister of finance of Canada, made a similar statement. A few days since Mr. Cartier, who seems to be a leading member of the Canadian Parliament, and a gentleman of decided force, as I find the statement in the body of a twelve hours' speech, said of this treaty:

"The codfish, in fact, has procured us the treaty. And this important and valuable fish would bear considerably upon the question as to whether the Americans would renew the treaty, and probably procure its continuance."

Mr. Cartier does well to avoid a discussion of the general results of the treaty, and he might well call the codfish valuable should it effect so important a result. Canada should follow the example of Massachusetts, and give the codfish a prominent place in her legislative halls should it insure the continuance of this treaty.

And I find an outside influence at work for this treaty in the name of the fisheries. But no man on the floor has a better right to speak in relation to the fisheries than I have, for I represent a district with a very long range of sea-coast and having a large capital engaged in the business. And I say to the House do not delay the repeal of the treaty on account of the fishermen. They have had many favors of the General Government for which they are duly thankful, and if it be true that this treaty is injurious to other sections of the Union and is to be continued solely for their benefit, they say with great magnanimity that they are willing to give up their individual good for the benefit of the whole. And it is one of those sacrifices they would make quickly.

The truth is, the fishing interest exercised no influence in bringing about this treaty, although very much was done in its name. Mr. Cartier slanders the "codfish" when he says it effected so poor a bargain. I can tell him who did make the treaty. It was the Canadian government, and Canadian money circulating freely here in Washington, lubricating the official channels through which the treaty and accompanying laws had to pass. It may be that the eastern manufacturers assisted them. If so they got badly cheated, as the diminished exports of manufactures plainly prove.

2. I know the manufacturers had large expectations from the treaty. They reckoned upon getting raw material cheaper from the provinces. They thought they could support their operatives at less expense with the potatoes, wood, and lumber of the provinces than if they were obliged to obtain those articles from Maine; and while doing this they reckoned upon adding largely to their sales. But in this they were mistaken. They lost more in the falling off of customers than they gained by cheapening what they bought. The fact that after the treaty went into operation our exports to the provinces fell off, settled this conclusively. Instead of an increase of export of manufactures which should correspond with the increase of imports and the large increase of population on both sides of the line, the export of manufactures fell off largely. I do not propose to go into detail of this. Two years since I had the honor to present to the House resolutions adopted by the Legislature of my State condemnatory of this treaty, and I took occasion at that time to give the statistics connected with the whole trade with the provinces, and particularly the export of manufactures since the date of the treaty.

Mr. WARD. With the permission of the gentleman from Maine, I desire simply to ask whether, in the resolutions of the Legislature of that State to which he refers, the second one did not contemplate a new treaty.

Mr. PIKE. No; the resolutions to which I referred asked the abrogation of the treaty.

Mr. WARD. The second resolution contemplated a new treaty. I can produce the resolution itself.

Mr. PIKE. The resolutions of which I speak did not. I presume the gentleman refers to another set of resolutions. I was going on to say that steadily from that time to this our exports of manufactures have declined. Some weeks ago the House called on the Secretary of the Treasury for some statistics upon the subject of this treaty.

In his letter sent in here a few days since I find a table giving the values of certain manufactures exported to Canada for five years, from 1858-59 to 1862-63. The results as given are instructive. The years end July 1 in each year:

For 1859 the exports were.....	$4,185,516
1860 " " .....	3,548,114
1861 " " .....	3,501,642
1862 " " .....	2,596,930
1863 " " .....	1,510,802

I commend the table to manufacturers.

Another table given in the same letter is equally important as giving the general results of the treaty:

The year ending June 30, 1854, was the last complete year prior to the treaty. And the year ending June 30, 1861, should stop the comparison, as the trade has been greatly deranged since then by the war. It is well known that the provincial markets have been flooded by our goods sent there to obtain gold in exchange, and it is also well known that all along the provincial line goods have been exported for the purpose of obtaining the drawback and then smuggled back into this country. This evil has become so great that regular traders complain of it, and at their request I introduced a resolution some days since asking the Committee on Commerce to consider the propriety of renewing the old law which provided that drawbacks should not be paid when articles were shipped to the provinces. In this way since the war our nominal exports to the provinces have been swollen beyond the reality.

But what can be said in favor of a treaty which has the effect upon our exports which this seems to have had? The trade with the provinces had always been in our favor. It increased rapidly with the increasing population on either side of the line, bearing about the same relative proportion from year to year. But the treaty went into operation. Population and business continued to increase as rapidly as ever, but all at once the whole trade changed, and instead of exporting three dollars and importing one we were importing for the first time more than we exported!

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] gravely said yesterday that this was not a criterion by which to determine the value of trade; that whether the balance was against us or not still we derived a benefit from it. He has forgotten the exhibition which took place in this House two or three weeks ago, when for the purpose of checking this balance of trade against us with European nations we added fifty per cent. to our tariff. He has forgotten the attempt made all over the country by patriotic women to restrict themselves in what is perhaps one of their strongest desires, that of dress, for the purpose of diminishing this foreign trade. The desire of statesmen has been that we should not import so much, but that, as in 1861, our relations in trade with foreign countries should be put upon a satisfactory basis, so that the price of exchange should be knocked down and with it the price of gold.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. STEBBINS,] in his able speech upon the resources of the country the other day, said that if it was in his power he would draw a Chinese wall around our trade, and have no intercourse with foreign countries, rather than have this balance against us. And when the gentleman from New York who spoke yesterday [Mr. WARD] can demonstrate that the farmer had better buy of the trader, year after year, a great deal more than he sells, and, for the balance, mortgage the old farm, then he can demonstrate that a treaty which takes away a balance of $16,000,000 in our favor, and converts it into a balance of two or three million dollars against us, is profitable to us. Until he accomplishes that he must conclude with me that that treaty is nothing but an injury, and that constantly.

3. It was supposed that as this looked toward free trade commerce would be largely benefited. Ship-builders and ship-owners were, for that reason, in favor of the treaty. But it was of no manner of benefit to the ship-owners. The whole increase of provincial trade comes to us in provincial bottoms. I know that in my own State, in a profitable little eddy of provincial trade, there are those willing to foster the treaty at the expense of the whole country, and they talk of this treaty as benefiting commerce.

But this treaty, as the Committee on Commerce proposes to extend it, will throw open our coasting trade to these provinces. There is no logical reason, if the treaty be continued and extended, why our coasting trade should not be made free. The coasting trade now embraces two thirds of our whole tonnage. Our registered tonnage has been under the ban of the Alabama and other British pirates. It has greatly diminished, till now it is hard to find the American flag anywhere upon the ocean. It is now proposed to let this coasting trade open to the provincials, and thus subject the hardy men scattered along our coast, who pay our taxes and upon whom in peace and war the Government must lean for support, to a competition with people who have cheaper wood, cheaper iron, and cheaper labor. The provinces could always build vessels and sail them as cheap as we could, and now that they go untaxed, how could our coasters maintain a competition with them if placed on the same footing? Would not the coasting trade follow the foreign, and our "enrolled and licensed" tonnage diminish as rapidly as the "registered" has done within the past three years?

In these particulars the treaty has failed to meet the expectations of those who so diligently got it up. The report of the Committee on Commerce speaks of the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, which is secured by the treaty; and how valuable this grant has been to us is shown by the letter of the Secretary to which I have already referred. It appears by that, up to the latest dates, forty vessels had availed themselves of it, making an average of five vessels a year. In the last four years there have been but eleven of our vessels that have gone to sea through this river. Should the effect of repealing the treaty be to withhold this boon of the "free navigation of the St. Lawrence," about which so much was said prior to 1854, it is to be hoped the lake commerce will be able to survive the loss!

I now call the attention of the House to a serious loss of revenue which the Government sustains every day during the continuance of the treaty. It cannot be estimated at less than $10,000,000 per annum.

When the treaty went into operation we were collecting about one million three hundred thousand dollars of duties on imports from the provinces. Since then we have not received enough to pay the salaries of officials along the lines. We should restore these duties, and, following the Canadian example, add to them largely.

The import from the provinces is over twenty millions annually, and could well bear a taxation of $3,000,000, by means of a tariff, which would have the effect to throw a portion of its own burdens upon the foreign producer.

This is a direct loss to the Government. But there is another, equally large, which results from the admission of provincial products. While the treaty lasts we are unable to tax our own manufactures. Take, for instance, the lumber trade. It is very large, ranking in the census list as third among our manufactures. It is ordinarily a close business, requiring large outlays and producing small compensation by way of percentage on the capital employed. The uncertainties attending it are nearly as great as those of the fisheries.

But it is carried on by a vigorous class of men. The war has shown them to be among the toughest and hardest men in the country. Amid many discouragements they produce annually nearly a hundred million dollars' worth of various kinds of lumber. The census gives the product of 1860 at $96,000,000. This goes into the hands of parties who can well afford to pay the enhanced price caused by the manufacturing tax. But suppose the tax is laid upon it now, what would be the result? In all cases where the provincial lumber merchant could reach the market at the same price of transportation, he would take the supply and drive off the American manufacturer. The difference of one or two dollars per thousand would be fatal to our people engaged in that trade. The provinces are celebrated for their valuable forests. It forms their distinguishing characteristic, and up to this time it has been their policy to encourage lumbermen by permitting them to operate on Government lands at small rates of compensation. On this account our people engaged in the same trade find these provincial operators sharp competitors, and no interest has been so badly damaged by the operation of the reciprocity treaty as that of lumber. Abrogate the treaty and you may tax the lumber imported from the provinces a handsome sum. It amounts ordinarily to between three and four million dollars annually. The producer will pay his share of that tax. Further than this you can tax our own lumbermen the same as other manufacturers, and they can do as other manufacturers do—get as much as they can out of their customers and pay the balance themselves. In this way a considerable sum can be obtained for our depleted Treasury.

The same thing may be said of flour. The original internal revenue bill, in 1862, assessed a tax of ten cents a barrel upon flour. This would have given a revenue of nearly two million dollars. But it was stricken out because of Canadian competition under the reciprocity treaty.

These articles, lumber, fish, and the cereals—termed, in the elaborate language of the negotiations that led to the treaty, the products of the sea, the forest, and the farm—are the chief articles we receive from the provinces. On an average of years, they are about two thirds the whole import. One year since the treaty they were valued at $15,469,976, and the whole import from the provinces was but $19,333,455.

Reckoning the loss by the admission of articles duty free and by the forced omission to tax our own production, and the loss to the revenue cannot be less than $10,000,000 annually so long as the treaty shall continue in force.

Of course, if the treaty has failed in the respects I have mentioned, it must be regarded as a business failure. If our total exports have lessened since it went into operation, and particularly if our export of manufactured articles has diminished, and if in the mean time our commerce has not been benefited by additional employment, if the large fishing interest is anxious to put an end to this arrangement because of the detriment it receives from it, and if the revenue suffers greatly by its continuance, then I say, as a commercial arrangement it has not answered the expectations which gave it existence, and it should be abrogated.

On the other hand, the provinces have very largely increased their export to us. They have run it up until the balance of trade has been in their favor, and we were obliged to send them gold for the surplus. They have increased their tariff, and thus added to the revenue derived from their connection with us. Their fishermen have been benefited by free access to our market, and their ship-yards have been busy supplying new vessels for the American trade. In all respects they have been the happy recipients of the benefits of this treaty and we the unfortunate losers.

And still, notwithstanding this sorry exhibit of the results of the workings of this treaty, I find there is some hesitancy about acting. Some doubt the expediency of giving the notice required by the treaty for fear of the effect of such action on our foreign political relations.

Let us see how that is. No doubt that political considerations had great weight in getting up the treaty. The free-trade idea had impressed itself upon Congress. Members somehow had become penetrated with the notion that custom-houses were to be abolished. A small revenue was to be got, they did not know how, and then we were to leave all traders to enjoy unlimited liberty of action. It was universally thought the "world was governed too much."

Our immense domestic trade between the different States was frequently cited as a result following the removal of all restrictions. The celebrated report of Mr. Walker, when Secretary of the Treasury in 1846, goes into these calculations largely, and exhibits the enormous volume of trade that could be carried on with the world if intercourse was as free with foreign States as between our own States. And many relied upon the mollifying influences of increased trade to bring about annexation of the provinces to this Government. It was a time of "manifest destiny." We had obtained new Territories on the south and west by purchase and by war, and now we were to win still more valuable acquisitions on the north and east by the gentler modes of trade. We were granting large favors, and we expected a kind of provincial gratitude in return which would yield substantial results.

The calculation was somewhat simple, but it had its influence. It ignored the fact that the provincial gets his political opinions from the mother Government. He is but an adjunct. He may be a Liberal, but he runs mad over the idea of royalty. The sentiment of devotion to the British Crown is much more intense in Cape Town or Halifax than in Pall-Mall or Charing-Cross, and the idea of separation from the British Government would shock the nerves of every provincial legislator this side the Atlantic, while it would be received with the utmost complacency in the imperial Parliament.

When I say that there is hesitancy in some quarters about acting in this matter for fear of the effect, I do not mean because of any doubt about the sufficiency of the experiment in the particulars I have mentioned. This free-trade and annexation nonsense has been knocked out of our people long ago. Nobody tolerates such an idea now. The truth is, we have received a rude shock in the last three years in our intercourse with foreign nations. We begin to be impressed with the wisdom of Washington's Farewell Address when he said we "should constantly keep in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another," and I do not know that we should be blamed if we went further and agreed with Napoleon that "nations hate each other." We discover at last that amid all the professions of friendship which diplomats make along with that "distinguished consideration" which always marks their intercourse, the London Times hits it more nearly when it says:

"But while the Republic was overtopping and overshadowing us, while it stretched its limbs and raised its tones to the scale of a giant, it was impossible but that our sympathy should be weakened. We feel for men, not for giants, for monsters, for madmen, for those altogether out of our rank and species."

"Mr. M. Gibson cannot surely demand from us that we should absolutely give the United States to retain their 'integrity,' or now recover it, so as to make a vast political unity of the kind Mr. Bright describes. That would be to wish our own abasement and our own destruction."

I have no bitterness of feeling toward these provinces. Many of their leading men I know as gentlemen of great intelligence and worth. But I cannot help adverting to the miserable failure of the treaty in this respect as well as the other. These provinces, while catching their tone from the home Government, have far outrun it in hostile feeling toward us in this struggle. That Government has behaved badly enough. We have scored up against it a long catalogue of offenses. By and by, when we are in condition to enforce our demands, we shall take out our budget and direct the minister at the court of St. James to present them. I see by the recent debates in Parliament that some uneasiness is felt about the claims we have against them, and when Mr. Adams on several occasions brought to Earl Russell's notice the damages done by the British pirate Alabama, he was answered very curtly and with considerable show of impatience. It will be different one of these days.

But the English Government is exceedingly sensible; it does not attack another Power unless quite sure it is considerably weaker. In 1861 the English opinion was very decided that this southern rebellion must end in separation. It then hastened to recognize the Montgomery government as a belligerent. Mr. Adams was on his way with communications from the Administration just installed in power, but so impressed were they of the weakness of this Government that they treated it with contempt, and made public this recognition on the very day of his arrival in London. From this acknowledgment sprang their power on the sea and the destruction of the immense amount of property catalogued and presented to the House the other day by the gentleman from New York. As this Government has shown its strength, the British ministry has behaved better. The Alabama escaped while they were higgling and quibbling over the evidences offered of her character. The Government at last concluded she ought to be stopped, but did not act upon their conclusions until it was too late. Had they exercised half the promptness about this that they did about acknowledging the rebels as belligerents the pirate would not now be at large, and our shipping would have been uninjured.

The Alabama's cruise created a sensation on this side the Atlantic, and the indignation expressed made the Government move faster the next time. The Alexandra was seized before she got to sea, but she was prosecuted so indifferently that an eye-witness writes me that the verdict was rendered amid a popular hurrah—nobody supposing the Government was in earnest in the prosecution. And now, after the case has gone through the forms of law and been decided by the highest law court, it is said that the "law officers of the Crown" give the opinion that the "foreign enlistment act" needs no amendment, because the strength of the Government's case was not presented at the trial!

The position of the Government as to the iron-clads last September shows the advance made by it in consequence of movements on this side the Atlantic. I have a high respect for the statesmanship exhibited in the management of our foreign relations. I do not wish to detract a particle from the credit due to it. But the British Government watches much more carefully the movements of our generals in the field than of our Secretary of State, whose most important dispatches are those wherein he describes the military situation. The iron-clads were under full progress in the Mersey. Mr. Laird was very bold in Parliament. But the Atlanta was disabled by three blows from the Weehawken. Vicksburg fell. Lee was driven back from Pennsylvania. The rebels lost a hundred thousand men in a month. Mr. Adams discussed the movements of the iron-clads boldly, and said to Earl Russell, "My lord, this is war!" and the iron-clads were stopped. The British Government has a high respect for the upper dog in the fight. They will not help the rebels a moment longer than they get along well. They realize Dr. Johnson's description of a patron: "For what is a patron, my lord, but one who sees with unconcern a man struggling in the water, but when he reaches shore incumbers him with help?"

I give full credit to the British Government for not continuing the war under the circumstances. But I cannot forget that the immense blockade we have been obliged to maintain for more than thirty-six hundred miles of coast line has been run by vessels of no other nationality than British, and the destruction of the eighty or ninety thousand tons of our shipping nominally by rebels has been mainly by vessels "sent forth and maintained upon the high seas by British subjects." These are serious facts which we should be unwise to overlook when we consider the terms upon which the two countries really stand with each other, although we might good-naturedly wish to forget them.

It is quite true that we have friends in Great Britain. Earl Russell said at Blairgowrie that a majority of the people were on our side. We gained these friends in a fair, manly way; and I thank them for the expressions of sympathy with which they have frequently encouraged us. They did not at first see the wit of a war occasioned by slavery which was to leave the status of every man on this continent the same as it found it. They were puzzled by Mr. Seward's instructions to our foreign ministers, and well they might be. But when the proclamation of the President put the whole thing upon a common-sense footing they appreciated our position. There is among the middling classes of the English people an innate love of fair play which came to our aid, and all the real friends we have in England we owe to the disposition manifested by our Government to deal justly with all men of whatever class. Let us retain these friends by equal manliness. Cringing is always poor policy; it is as bad as blustering. The British Government has improved in her treatment of us as we have manifested increasing strength and with it increasing boldness of speech and demand. There need be no fear now that proper action on our part in regard to this matter of the treaty will be followed by bad results.

I say this of the British Government because it is with them we have to deal. I say their conduct to us in this war does not entitle them to any peculiar consideration at our hands, and further, that the course of events to which I have alluded shows plainly that any forbearance to enforce our rights would be thrown away and entirely unappreciated.

As to the provinces, they are as nearly incorrigible as people can be. Bishop Berkeley said of the Canadians forty years ago:

"They appear, indeed, to come short of no British subjects throughout the world in devoted attachment to our Government, and [what to them is a necessary part of that attachment] in a rooted aversion to that of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the gentleman from Maine have leave to finish his speech.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I do not know that there is much difference between Canada and the other provinces in this respect. Nassau has been as active an ally of the rebels as Charleston or Wilmington. They have rendered them valuable assistance by every safe means in their power, and a few days since I saw that three of their pilots had been punished for piloting our men-of-war! Semmes lighted his way through the sinuous passages of the British West India islands by the fires of our burning merchantmen, and whenever hard pressed by our cruisers dropped into one of these friendly "neutral" ports for an ovation and a new outfit. In August last, at the small British settlement on the southern extremity of Africa, the people clambered to the highest points of lookout in full numbers and watched the pursuit of a small American merchantman chased by one of these pirates. The merchant vessel was seeking shelter in this "neutral" port. She was a small bark engaged in the peaceful errands of commerce; her pursuer a powerful steamer fully armed. One would have thought the sympathies of that distant people would have been with the weak and flying. But no. When the Alabama struck the Sea Bride and devoted her to destruction all Cape Colony shouted for joy! Whether distant or remote the colonies all show the same feeling. Nova Scotia is no better than Nassau or Cape Town. In July last the United States steamer Howqua visited Halifax for the purpose of coaling, and this is the official account of Lieutenant Devens, her commanding officer:

CHARLESTOWN, July 3, 1863.

Sir: During the recent cruise of the steamer Howqua under my command, it became necessary for me to put into the port of Halifax for coal, and I would most respectfully call your attention to the many insults offered to and the outrageous manner in which my officers and self were treated by the citizens of the place. A portion of the facts are as follows:

As the Howqua was dropping away from the coal wharf one of the crew attempted to desert, when three of my officers went on the wharf for the purpose of arresting said deserter; they were mobbed by the citizens of the place, knocked down, badly bruised, and otherwise treated in a most shameful manner, and the deserter rescued from them. In passing through the streets I was subjected to the most trying insults.

As the vessel proceeded down the harbor, crowds collected on the ends of the wharves cheering for the rebels and Jeff. Davis. Men came down and tried to induce my men to desert, while others came around the ship with secession flags and singing secession songs.

As not the slightest cause for insult was offered by my officers, I attribute the treatment we received to the fact of our being northern officers and to the sympathy of the citizens of Halifax with the rebels.

Your most obedient servant,

EDWARD F. DEVENS,
Acting Volunteer Lieutenant Commanding.

HON. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

The affair of the Chesapeake is too recent an occurrence to be forgotten. The men who seized her and murdered her engineer escaped into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and by means of lagging officials and a willing judiciary got rid of punishment.

Sir, I take no pleasure in reproducing here these well-authenticated instances of the ill-will of the British provinces. I would not have this House act in temper or from any motives of revenge. But I wish to show the utter failure of this treaty to produce active and substantial friendliness. And I wish further that the House should act free from any threat, express or implied. We legislate on the supposition that the Union is to be restored sooner or later, and all the States continue under one Government. On any other supposition than that, the immense mass of Government bonds we are putting upon the market would be nothing short of a swindle, for no one supposes that any fragment of a broken-down Government, however large, would ever pay these vast debts. And if we are to continue one Government, surely we can make such trade regulations as we please.

It was objected in the other branch of Congress to the tariff of 1861 that foreign nations would take offense. But luckily the objection, made, if I remember rightly, by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, did not prevail. We made such tariff as our own interests dictated, and have since reaped the benefits of it. Should we become dismembered and our Government broken down, I care nothing what this Congress or any future Congress may say or do. The fragments must get on as well as other Governments will let them. They must defer to the opinions of any first-class Power that chooses to interest itself in their affairs. They must do as they shall be bid to do. But until then—and that time will never come—I beg that we shall, in legislating here, consult our own interests rather than the good will or ill will of any foreign Power.

As to war on account of the fisheries, should we go back to the convention of 1818—it is idle to talk about it. We lived under that arrangement for thirty-six years without war. Some of our vessels were seized for violating the stipulations of the treaty, and a few were condemned. But of our whole fleets only twenty-five were finally condemned; and it is computed that during that time our vessels made at least eighteen thousand voyages there. It is probable that in the future the same results will follow, and there is no reason to suppose anything more serious unless we choose for our own purposes to commence hostilities.

Why, then, should we go about begging for a new treaty? Why send commissioners, as is provided by the resolution reported from the committee, whose duty it shall be to beseech the provinces to enter into a new arrangement? They cannot accept entire free trade. They need revenue and cannot forego tariffs. They have already said that the Zollverein proposed two years ago was separation from Great Britain, and of course such a proposition cannot be entertained. What, then, can commissioners propose? Nothing. It is the idlest ceremony in the world to send respectable gentlemen on an errand to offer what the provinces cannot accept, and what, if they could accept, we could not give. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] will be adopted, and the House content itself with simply giving the notice required by the treaty. If other and more satisfactory propositions are to be made hereafter we can consider them. Meantime let us place the trade under the guardianship of general laws, and get rid of this special arrangement which has brought us nothing but pecuniary loss and political obloquy.

Mr. ARNOLD. The House of Representatives of the United States is to-day considering whether it is for the interest of the people to continue a treaty with Great Britain, and I have been somewhat surprised at the tone of the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] in the discussion of that question. It is a question of national interest, and not a question of sentiment or of national hostility. If the decision of the question is to be placed upon the ground that Great Britain, by her outrages upon our country, has placed herself in the condition of an outlaw, with whom it is humiliating to the United States to trade, and if it is upon that ground that the gentleman asks for an abrogation of the treaty, be it so. But, sir, it seems to me that in the discussion of a question like this, which addresses itself to the interests of the American people, those considerations can only be introduced for the purpose of exciting prejudice and of preventing a full and fair discussion of the merits of the question.

Sir, there is not a member of this House, I apprehend, who is willing that our country for any purpose should do anything which would be humiliating, or that it should do anything unbecoming the dignity of a great people. The report of the Committee on Commerce upon this subject, as I understand it, providing for commissioners to consider and discuss this treaty, does not propose that the United States shall do anything unbecoming the dignity of the people. Some ten years ago the United States and Great Britain entered into a treaty which was designed to be, and to some extent unquestionably is, a reciprocity treaty, and for the interests of both nations.

Sir, a people of great commercial importance lies to the north of us. The territory on our northern frontier from ocean to ocean is under the control of Great Britain. We have great and diversified interests in connection with that territory. It was thought by the statesmen by whom the reciprocity treaty was negotiated, and by the Congress by which it was ratified and confirmed, that rather than have a war of conflicting tariffs and restrictions on trade, it was better for the important interests of both Great Britain and the United States that in respect to some subjects there should be an attempt at freedom of trade and reciprocity; and to secure this they entered into this treaty. Now, experience has demonstrated that the treaty, in many particulars, needs modification. This is not strange. Taking into consideration the growth of those provinces and the growth of our own country, and the changes which the last ten years have produced in both countries, it is natural that this treaty should require modification and readjustment. That which was well ten years ago may need modification now, and the question which we have to determine to-day is, whether any treaty can be so formed that it shall be for the mutual advantage of both countries. If it can be, let us seek at least to attain it. If it cannot be, then let us dissolve the connections growing out of the treaty, and let each country depend upon its own legislation for the protection of its own trade.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] has dwelt to-day very elaborately on the question of the fisheries, and he has stated that he represents that interest to a greater extent than any member on this floor. I have no doubt that he speaks correctly in that. He has presented the subject as to the effect of this treaty on the manufactures of New England, and, to some extent, upon its commerce.

I shall not follow the gentleman from Maine on those topics, but I desire the attention of the House for a few minutes, and especially that portion of the Representatives in Congress from the great grain-producing sections of the Northwest, while I attempt to give some reasons why, in my judgment, that portion of the Union would be injuriously affected by the abrogation of this treaty.

Mr. Speaker, the great need of the Northwest, the necessity of those great grain-growing, food-producing States, is additional means and facilities for carrying their products to market. The great evil experienced by farmers in the valley of the Mississippi, and in the lake region, is the cost of the transportation of their agricultural products to the markets of the world. That is the grievance they most severely feel, and which weighs more heavily upon their prosperity than any other.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the effect of the abrogation of this treaty will be to shut up one of the great channels by which the agricultural products of the Northwest find their way to the Atlantic markets and to Europe. The great territory of the valley of the Mississippi and of the lakes has naturally two great outlets and avenues to market. One is the great Father of Waters, the Mississippi, and the other through the lakes and the St. Lawrence, extending from the very center of the continent to the Atlantic. These are the grand provisions which nature has made to furnish an outlet for that grain-growing, food-producing portion of the Union.

I represent a district where a portion of the rain which falls from heaven flows into the valley of the Mississippi, and through the Mississippi river into the Gulf of Mexico; and the other portion into the lakes, and by the lakes to the ocean, through the St. Lawrence. These great outlets are a necessity to that portion of the Union. You cannot close them to our commerce without the most serious injury to this great granary of the Union. I know that the great State of New York, by means of her canals, by means of the expenditure which she has made with great sagacity, has opened to her own lordly river, the Hudson, access to the lakes, and that through her canals and through the Hudson much the largest portion of our products find their way to the seaboard. Yet I ask the Representatives from Minnesota, and Iowa, and Wisconsin, and Missouri, and Michigan, and Ohio, and Indiana, and Illinois, whether the various means of taking our products to the ocean have not been for years past taxed to their utmost capacity. I ask you whether the New York canals have not been loaded even beyond their great capacity by the productiveness of the West. I ask you whether not only the New York canals but every railroad connecting the West with the seaboard have not been taxed to carry off the surplus productions of the Northwest, while your warehouses have been kept overflowing, nay, have been crushed by the quantity of grain waiting the means of transportation.

The great commercial fact of to-day, felt and realized, is that we have outgrown our canals. The country is too big for them. The problem is, shall production stop its increase, or shall our canals be enlarged? The necessity of this enlargement is manifest by the enormous profits of the great railways, and the extravagant rates of transportation, showing that the quantity to be carried forward is so vast that carriers command their own terms. The warehouses and mammoth elevators of the lake towns for the last two years have been crushed with freight; everything which could be made to float on the lakes and canals has been taxed to the utmost, and proved insufficient to carry to market the products of the West. This necessity for greater facilities, and the failure in Congress of the bills for enlarging the New York and Illinois canals, have led to a zealous effort on the part of the West to obtain, by Canadian canals, that relief which is (we trust only temporarily) denied through our own country and by our own Government. Illinois and Wisconsin, through their State authorities, and the boards of trade of several lake cities, appointed delegates to Canada to obtain, if possible, avenues to market for the vast accumulation of western produce.

Necessity will force the West into new avenues to the Atlantic unless the present are enlarged. That both Canada and Great Britain appreciate the value of this western trade is shown by their construction, for the purpose of securing it, of the Victoria bridge at Montreal, at a cost of $7,000,000, and the Grand Trunk railway at a cost of more than sixty million dollars, in addition to the canals before referred to.

It is obvious, from these and other facts, that we have reached that point when, with our present means of transportation, the production of corn and other cereals cannot to any great extent be profitably increased. This condition should not surprise us. The canals were constructed while the West was in embryo. In 1837 the number of tons transported from west of Buffalo, on the Erie canal, was 56,255. In 1861 the number reached 2,156,426.

The product of wheat and corn carried on the New York canal from the lake States of Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin, in 1850, was 252,000,000 bushels; in 1860, 354,000,000 bushels.

The population of these States, and Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, and Nebraska, in 1850, was 5,403,595; in 1860 it was 9,092,009.

The value of western products has increased more than one hundred per cent. in the last four years. In 1859 it was, in round numbers, $53,000,000, and in 1862, $111,000,000. Our foreign exports are made up largely of breadstuffs and provisions. In four years they increased from $38,305,991 in 1859, to $122,650,043 '72 in 1862, increasing in two years one hundred and eighty per cent., and in three years two hundred and twenty per cent. The amount of $122,650,043 for 1862 is exclusive of $11,100,043 which went out through Canada, making the aggregate over $133,750,000.

The following table, compiled from the preliminary reports of the census for 1860, will show the progress of the West, and will furnish data by which its present and future necessities may be more fully realized.

For years past the West has been struggling to increase the facilities for transporting her produce to market. In face of these efforts, in face of the peculiar reasons existing at the present time for increasing such efforts, it is proposed to shut up one great avenue the West has to the ocean by the abrogation of this treaty! As a reason for doing this injury to the West we are told to-day that the Alabama has preyed upon our commerce; and articles are read from the London Times to excite national animosity against Great Britain for the purpose of inducing the American Congress to close up one of the great avenues to the ocean because we dislike the people of the country through which we must pass on the way to the seaboard. I ask gentlemen whether this is wise statesmanship? I ask whether it is wise because England has not acted in good faith toward this country during this war, because she has treated our country in such a way as we shall not soon forget, is it wise for that reason, when $18,000,000 of our agricultural products found their way through Canadian channels to a market year before last, and $15,000,000 last year, to close up that avenue? And are the sneers of the London Times a good reason for doing this?

I ask gentlemen representing the agricultural districts of the West, what will be the consequence of such a step upon the agricultural prospects of the West? We who live at the West have felt—especially during the last three years, since the Mississippi river has been substantially blocked up and closed—the inadequacy of the means furnished for the transportation of our products. We have been powerless under our grievances; we have been compelled to submit to an enormous increase in the cost of transporting our produce to market.

Now, the treaty which it is proposed to abrogate provides that the river St. Lawrence and the

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1864.

NEW SERIES, No. 149.

canals in Canada shall be open to our commerce upon the same terms as to the subjects of Great Britain residing in the Canadian provinces. In consideration of that we gave them the right to navigate Lake Michigan. We have not only the right of navigation of the St. Lawrence river, but all these Canadian canals costing millions of dollars are open to our traffic in consideration of our opening Lake Michigan to Canadian commerce.

The following is the fourth article of the treaty:

"It is agreed that the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall have the right to navigate the river St. Lawrence and the canals in Canada, used as the means of communicating between the great lakes and the Atlantic ocean, with their vessels, boats, and crafts, as fully and freely as the subjects of her Britannic Majesty, subject only to the same tolls and other assessments as now are or may hereafter be exacted of her Majesty's said subjects; it being understood, however, that the British Government retains the right of suspending this privilege on giving due notice thereof to the Government of the United States.

"It is further agreed that if at any time the British Government should exercise the said reserved right, the Government of the United States shall have the right of suspending, if it think fit, the operation of article three of the present treaty in so far as the province of Canada is affected thereby, for so long as the suspension of the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence or the canals may continue.

"It is further agreed that British subjects shall have the right freely to navigate Lake Michigan with their vessels, boats, and crafts, so long as the privilege of navigating the river St. Lawrence secured to American citizens by the above clause of the present article shall continue, and the Government of the United States further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

"And it is further agreed that no export duty or other duty shall be levied on lumber or timber of any kind cut on that portion of the American territory in the State of Maine watered by the river St. John and its tributaries and floated down that river to the sea, when the same is shipped to the United States from the province of New Brunswick."

Under the provision of this treaty twelve and a half per cent. of all the food that finds its way to the Atlantic has passed through these Canadian canals. Now, when it is apparent that the great necessity of the West for additional means of transportation calls for additional facilities to enable them to carry their products to the Atlantic, when the channels open to us are not half adequate to our wants, it is gravely proposed to close up one of the great avenues of trade and thus force everything over the New York railroads and the New York canals.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether I understand him as saying that our own system of canals and railroads is insufficient to bring to market the products of the Northwest.

Mr. ARNOLD. Yes, sir; I answer the gentleman they are entirely insufficient. The capacity of these railroads and canals has been taxed to the utmost extent during these last three years. Those controlling your New York canals, finding that there was more business than could be done on the canals and on all the railroads, have raised their tolls as high as the rate of charges on the railroads; so that often during the last two years you could transport a barrel of flour or a barrel of pork from the city of Chicago to the city of New York on the same terms on the railroad as by canal, because there is more to be carried than both railroads and canals had the ability to transport.

A year ago last fall there were twenty-five thousand hogs kept in the city of Pittsburg for weeks because there were no means of transporting them to the eastern market; and in the city of Chicago millions and millions of grain have been kept in its vast warehouses, because there has been no means of transporting it to market by railroad, canal, or any other way.

And in the face of these facts we are asked to close up one great avenue, an avenue through which one twelfth part of our grain and goods finds its way to the seaboard!

But, sir, the West is still in its infancy and will need far greater means of transportation than all—including Canadian canals—we now possess. I have the official reports of the State of New York showing that the existing canal and railroad facilities are inadequate to carry to market the products of the West. The gentleman from New York will corroborate that statement. Yet in the face of that fact you ask us to give notice for the termination of this treaty. What will be the consequence? The means of transportation being limited and inadequate, the transporters of freight will be enabled to fix their own price. We shall have no competition and be entirely in the hands of the New York canals and the New York and Pennsylvania railroads. We pay now on the grain and pork and beef of the West as high a tax as they will possibly bear. The farmers in Illinois have been compelled to burn their corn as fuel because they could not get it to market. Yet you ask us, because you hate Great Britain, to terminate this treaty which furnishes one great outlet to the West.

Mr. MORRILL. I dislike to interfere with the course of the gentleman's argument, but I desire to ask him if he does not think that the means of transportation by railroads and canals that lead from the West to the Atlantic coast would not be somewhat relieved if they were permitted to carry our agricultural products alone and were not burdened with those which come from Canada.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have not time to quote from the official reports of the State of New York, verifying the statements I have made in regard to the capacity of their railroads and canals. I will state to the gentlemen who are disposed to investigate this subject further that much more of our produce goes over the Canadian canals than Canadian produce passes over the New York canals, and that when New York passed resolutions by her Legislature asking Congress to enlarge the Erie canal, the official report shows that such has been the growth of the Northwest and her productive capacity that they have taxed the existing canals to the utmost capacity and that they are incapable of carrying off our surplus products.

Now, New York reaps a rich harvest from our trade. We pay into the treasury of the State of New York and into the treasuries of the railroad companies of that State millions and millions of dollars annually, which comes part out of the pockets of the producing classes of the West and part out of the pockets of the consuming class in New England. Cheapen the cost of transportation, and while you raise the price of every bushel of wheat and corn in the West, you cheapen every loaf of bread consumed in New England. I submit to the Representatives from New England whether, by closing every other outlet and making everything go through the canals and railroads of New York and Pennsylvania, we do not put it in the power of those controlling these railroads and canals to tax still higher every loaf of bread for New England. True, we have one check on them now in the Welland and other Canadian canals. Abrogate the treaty and we are divested of that exit to the Atlantic. Then the entire volume of the trade of the lakes will be forced to find its way through the States of New York and Pennsylvania.

I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the Northwestern Christian Advocate, published in the city of Chicago, which is edited with great ability, and the article presents the subject in a way entitling it to the consideration of members of the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"THE RECIPROCITY TREATY IN CONGRESS.—Our readers have not forgotten that at the last session of Congress a selfish effort was made to have the necessary steps taken for the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty between Great Britain and the United States. It was whiningly asserted that the farmers of New York were being ruined by the competition of their Canadian neighbors, in the face of the indisputable fact that those farmers are now receiving vastly increased prices for all their products over what was paid them but a few years ago. The real cause of this effort, however, can probably be found in the competition in transportation between the New York canals and railroads and the Canadian route. How injuriously this affects New York may be judged from the official statement of one of her ablest public men, Hon. S. B. Ruggles, (N. Y. Assembly Doc. No. 174, 1863, p. 49,) who gives the following table, showing the routes by which the flour and grain passing down the lakes was carried eastward:

	Per cent.
From Buffalo.....	514
" Oswego.....	151
" Dunkirk and Suspension Bridge.....	9
" Minor points in New York.....	114
Descending the St. Lawrence to Montreal.....	124
Total.....	100

"In order to understand how vast is the carrying trade which the West furnishes to New York, we need only copy the following statistics from the same report, (page 48,) showing the amount of wheat and wheat flour in barrels transported over the New York canals, the first column being the amount furnished by New York herself, the second that furnished by the States west of her—seventy per cent. of the 'national' commerce, as Mr. Ruggles says, coming from Lake Michigan:

	Local.	National.
In 1837.....	747,678	284,302
In 1842.....	543,064	1,146,232
In 1847.....	791,106	3,989,233
In 1856.....	276,034	3,209,741
In 1861.....	745,622	6,712,233

"To this should be added the very important element of Indian corn, 'the transportation and consumption of which have reached only their infant stages:'

The 'national' wheat and flour carried on the New York canals in 1861 was..... 6,712,233 bbls.
The 'national' corn was..... 6,796,380 bbls.

Total..... 13,498,523 bbls.
The 'local' wheat and flour was..... 745,622
The 'local' corn was..... 210,510

955,532 bbls.

showing a 'national' proportion in these two cereals exceeding thirteen to one.

"In the 'products of the forest' a similar disparity exists, being in tons:

	Local.	National.
In 1837.....	174,733	7,637
In 1842.....	125,623	31,069
In 1847.....	328,552	117,923
In 1856.....	173,608	335,797
In 1860.....	166,687	647,705

"Thus is the West building up and enriching the city and State of New York; for which they may thank the far-sighted De Witt Clinton. But the grasping politicians and financiers of that State are not yet satisfied. They would gladly increase the tolls on their canals—and thereby secure greater traffic and consequent profit to their railroads—but dare not do it until they have placed the rival route via Montreal and the St. Lawrence out of our reach. The abrogation of the reciprocity treaty would close this competing route to us, and we should then be entirely at the mercy of the New York Canal Board and the New York railroads. Small as is the proportion of our products carried by the St. Lawrence route, it is sufficient to form an efficient check upon the rapacity of the New Yorkers, and in that respect alone is worth millions of dollars annually to the West.

"It may be urged that the New York canals have proved of great benefit to the West, and that that State should be reimbursed for her expenditures upon them. This we readily concede, and in reply point to the fact that by the building of these canals every acre of land in the State of New York has been doubled or quadrupled in value; the farmers in the western portion of the State, who were formerly compelled to give a bushel of wheat for a yard of calico, now obtain (or did obtain until the breaking out of the rebellion) from eight to twelve yards of calico for a bushel of wheat; and nearly all their material interests have been affected in a precisely similar manner. To this let us add the following statement, from official sources:

The gross tolls received from the New York canals, from July 4, 1817, to Sept. 30, 1861, amounted to $76,288,440
Deduct cost of repairs, superintendence and collection..... 21,915,961

Net amount..... $54,381,469 or more than one half the entire amount ($89,952,091) expended in constructing and enlarging the canals, and interest on the moneys borrowed by the State for that purpose, up to September 30, 1861. And the tolls are constantly increasing, as the business of the canals increases."

Mr. THAYER. I desire to direct the gentleman's attention to this precise point, whether it is not a question of rivalry under which, by the present arrangement, the gentleman's constituents get an advantage, rather than a question of the absolute incapacity of the system of railroads and canals which we have.

Mr. ARNOLD. I wish it was simply a question of rivalry, and I trust it will be by and by. When the Ottawa canal shall have been constructed, when the Welland canal shall be so enlarged as to receive propellers of seven hundred and fifty tons burden, when New York shall have enlarged her canals, and shall have constructed a canal around the falls of Niagara, and another from Lake Champlain to the St. Lawrence and to the Hudson—when by these means you may have made some provision for the products of the West, there may be possibly a question of competition and rivalry. But go on with these improvements as rapidly as you will, there will never come the day for the next century in which the products of the West will not increase with more rapidity than you can enlarge your canals. You may go on as rapidly as possible, but western products, with the tide of immigration there setting in, will increase still more rapidly than you can enlarge communication to accommodate that produce, so that the happy day of competition and rivalry is far off to which the gentleman alludes, when New York can say to the West, "Come here with your beef and pork and corn and wheat; we will underbid our Canadian neighbors;" and when gentlemen over the line can say, "Come this way, and we will take all you can bring us at a lower rate and quicker than New York." That is what the West wants, but what you New Yorkers do not want us to have, I fear; and hence you wish this treaty abrogated.

God made the St. Lawrence river. For what purpose? Was it for the use of the small Canadian provinces, or did he make it for floating upon its waters the products of our great western empire? We mean to have the St. Lawrence and we shall have it ultimately, and as a means of obtaining it we wish to continue this reciprocity treaty; and I trust the time will come, notwithstanding the denunciations of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Fiske,] when the Canadian provinces will see that under a system of government like ours they will be far more prosperous. They will look across the borders and see these great empire States, New York, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and the great cities of Oswego, Buffalo, Detroit, Chicago, and Milwaukee, and contrast the rapid development on this side the line with the slow coach of Canadian progress during the last century, and then come to the conclusion that under a Government like ours, under institutions like ours, they would share our prosperity, and thus ultimately and peacefully will seek a union with us. That is what we look for in the end; but in the mean time you must not shut up the St. Lawrence and the Canadian canals to our products. We must have their rivalry and competition with New York.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to ask my friend if he is not aware of the fact that a large number of grain-growers of the West have already gone to Canada, and if he has not seen a proclamation in the Canada papers that grain could be raised in Canada much cheaper than in the States, taking taxes and distance from the market into consideration. Has he not seen the statement that it would be better for grain-growers to go to Canada than to remain in the West? I will say to the gentleman that if I were going to raise grain I would, in preference to remaining in the West, go to Canada, where I should be nearer the market, and escape the taxes imposed upon us by this war.

Mr. PRUYN. I would ask the gentleman whether he intends that as an argument in favor of a discontinuance of the war. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. If it has any application at all, it would be in favor of putting down this rebellion.

Mr. ARNOLD. That is not the question before us now. Grant is carrying out that part of the business very well.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to a very important fact in connection with the ability of our country to supply Europe with food. Every intelligent gentleman will remember that when the rebellion broke out, and when the export of cotton was stopped, many supposed that our foreign exports would be entirely, or to a great extent, destroyed. The men who were wont to rule this country in these halls then, and who are now fighting us on the other side of the Potomac, supposed and boasted that cotton was king; and that by means of it they could control not only our own country but the world. Our experience has since developed the fact that cotton is not king, but that if there is any product of our country entitled to that dignity, it is corn. The exports of grain since the war began have to a very considerable extent made good the deficiency in the exportation of cotton.

I hold in my hand a statement showing from what portions of the world the food of Europe is supplied. I find from the statistics of 1861 that from the Baltic there were received 15,000,000 bushels of grain; from Russia, 12,000,000 bushels; from British America—mostly from the United States—12,000,000 bushels, and from the United States 54,000,000 bushels. Fifty-four million bushels of corn sent abroad from the United States in 1861 to feed Europe, and about 12,000,000 bushels, mostly the product of the United States, sent through Canada for the same purpose! It is a great object to be accomplished by the American statesman if we can send our agricultural products to Europe and compete successfully in the Old World against the products of Russia and the Baltic. We never can do that unless we have cheap transportation. With cheap transportation the capacity of the western soil is such that we can compete successfully against all the world in supplying Europe with food.

There is another fact to which I will advert for a moment in this connection. It is known to the country that no section of the Union has sent in proportion to its population so many soldiers to the war as the Northwest. I do not state this in any spirit of boasting. I merely state the fact that Illinois has given in proportion to its population a greater number of her laborers to the war than any other State; and yet there has been no considerable diminution of the products of that State. It is because of the peculiar formation of the country and of the facilities for introducing labor-saving machinery. Labor-saving machines can be used there to an extent that is known nowhere else, so that the amount of productions has not been to any considerable extent diminished. While the Northwest is sending 65,000,000 bushels of cereals to Europe annually, we have done that with but one twelfth our land under cultivation. Statistics show that in 1861, in that portion of the Union organized into States in the valley of the Mississippi, only one twelfth of the land was under cultivation. Who, then, can tell the extent to which this productiveness will reach? If to-day, with one twelfth of our soil only under cultivation, we produce an amount which is totally beyond the capacity of the New York canals and all the railways to take to market, I ask my friends from the Northwest whether it is wise to close up this avenue by the St. Lawrence and compel everything to find its way through the New York canals or over the great railroads of Pennsylvania and New York?

Sir, there is a great, active, and powerful pecuniary interest in this country which supposes it would be benefited by the abrogation of this treaty. By its abrogation you place the great grain-producing portion of the country in the power of railroad corporations and canal boards, who can fix their own price for transporting our products to market.

Hence, Mr. Speaker, I am against the abrogation of this treaty. And in regard to the objections made to it as to its inequality, to its injustice, to the advantages which it is supposed to confer upon Canada, I have only to say, remedy those evils, but do not destroy the treaty altogether. If we cannot remedy them, if after a fair trial we find that we cannot correct the treaty, if we cannot make a treaty which will be really and truly reciprocal in its character, if we find that on the whole it does us more harm than good, then let us give the notice to abrogate it. But why do it to-day? The conduct of Great Britain during this war is no reason that a statesman would give for abrogating this treaty. I do not propose, nor does any gentleman propose, to do anything in this connection unworthy the dignity of a great nation, but I can see nothing derogatory to national honor in sending commissioners to treat with Great Britain, to talk over this matter, and to see whether the evils complained of cannot be remedied.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The gentleman from Illinois proposes to meet commissioners from England, but I would like to know whether England has proposed to send commissioners. I do not pretend to treat this question as a statesman, but as a business man. The treaty has worked badly for us. We are satisfied of that. Now, I say abrogate it; and if Great Britain has any terms to offer, let us hear what they are.

Mr. ARNOLD. That objection, Mr. Speaker, is a mere question of etiquette. I am aware that in some particulars the treaty has operated unfavorably for us. I have no doubt that in some particulars it has operated in our favor; and I have no doubt that it could be modified to the mutual advantage of both parties. On the whole, I think we have gained as much as they have. I am not addressing myself to particular objections to the treaty, objectionable as it may be, and objectionable as it undoubtedly is in many particulars. I say let us see whether we cannot remedy these objections and retain the advantages we have reaped from it. Gentlemen say, abrogate it in the beginning and then try and make a new one. That is the argument, Mr. Speaker, of gentlemen who desire to have no treaty at all; it is the argument of those who seek to obtain great advantages to the railroad interests of the country by shutting up the St. Lawrence river and forcing all our products to go over these railroads running to the Atlantic cities. I do not refer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] especially, but to the gentlemen who seem to be most anxious that we should give notice of the abrogation of this treaty without making any attempt to amend or modify it. I apprehend that these gentlemen do not want any treaty at all. I do not refer to the gentleman from Maine or the gentleman from Vermont only; I refer to all gentlemen who have expressed themselves so distinctly in opposition to the treaty as it exists, and who I have heard express no desire that we should have any treaty at all.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman at all, but if he alludes to me I have only to say that I have not considered the railroad interest nor any other individual interest, but the interest and honor of the country. In fact, this treaty does not suit us. Under the terms of the treaty, whenever it does not suit either party it is the duty of that party to give notice of its abrogation. Now, we are exactly in that condition. I do not want to go to them with commissioners appointed in advance and ask them to negotiate about this treaty. I want to say to them that the treaty does not suit us, and we therefore, in conformity with its conditions, give notice of its abrogation. It will then be left open for either party to make propositions for a new treaty. I do not think it is our place to get down on our knees and say to Great Britain that we have appointed commissioners and that we ask them to appoint commissioners to modify this old treaty so as to give us a little more advantage.

Mr. ARNOLD. I cannot yield my time to the gentleman to make a speech. I will yield if not taken from my time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I beg the gentleman's pardon for taking his time, but he yielded to me.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman suggests what I might perhaps have overlooked. The treaty does not suit the gentleman from Pennsylvania as the representative of a great railroad interest. Of course I do not speak of him in that connection in any offensive sense. He represents his constituents as every gentleman is supposed to represent the interests of his particular section of country. There are sections of the country, however, where it is believed that great advantages are derived from the treaty. We believe in the Northwest that we have derived great advantages from the opening of the St. Lawrence river and the canals of the Canadian provinces to our commerce, through which, as I have said, $18,000,000 of our products have found market. We believe, therefore, that the Northwest derives great advantage from the treaty, and I desire to call the attention of the House to the consideration of that point.

Ours, Mr. Speaker, is a country of vast extent and diversified interests, extending from Maine to the far West. Here are the fisheries to be consulted, here are manufacturers to be consulted, there are railroad and transportation interests to be consulted, here is a great grain-producing country to be consulted, here are all these various diversified interests of the country to be consulted. I ask gentlemen before they destroy this treaty to consider whether they are likely to get a new one that will suit all these various interests. When you have once destroyed this treaty, the difficulty of getting a new one will be increased a hundred-fold. You will have to encounter not only the clashing interests of our own country, but the diversified interests of the Canadian provinces and of Great Britain. There are such diverse interests to be consulted that the negotiation of a new treaty that will accommodate them all can only be accomplished with the greatest difficulty.

Now, we have a treaty in existence, a treaty which has its merits and defects. The course of conduct I recommend is not to destroy that treaty, but to remedy its evils, correct its defects. Let us endeavor to make a fair and just treaty. If we can accomplish it, well and good; if not, then will be the time to give notice. That is the view I take of the question. That is the way to secure the advantages without the evils.

But there are gentlemen upon the floor who think that we ought not to have any treaty at all.

Mr. PIKE. I ask the gentleman from Illinois why this should be taken out of the general law which governs our trade. Why not subject it to the general law? What are the disadvantages?

Mr. ARNOLD. We cannot regulate trade with a foreign nation by a general law; but that would lead me into a general discussion of our commercial relations. The feature to which I address myself and regard as particularly important is that which secures the free navigation of the St. Lawrence and Canadian canals to western products. I do not go into any discussion of the fisheries. I confess myself unable to throw any light on that subject. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Maine that, in my judgment, it is possible to extend the terms of the treaty so as to include a larger number of articles than are now embraced.

Now, we are asked to give this notice mainly on the ground that Great Britain has behaved badly, and that it would be humiliating for us to treat with her. I confess, sir, that is carrying it very far. As I said in the beginning, if the conduct of Great Britain is such as to make her in the opinion of gentlemen an outlaw among the nations of the earth, then, to be consistent, they should not treat with her at all. They should cut off all diplomatic connection with her. I can see no reason, if we can treat with her on one subject without humiliation, why we cannot treat on the subject of the reciprocity treaty without humiliation. It is a keen discrimination which can see any difference, and this denunciation of England is introduced here by the gentlemen who wish to destroy the treaty. It is introduced here as a lawyer sometimes in pleading a bad case appeals to prejudice to prevent a jury coming to a fair and just conclusion. It is an attempt to create prejudice against the treaty on the part of the American people by recapitulating the outrages our country has suffered from Great Britain. Having done this, and aroused the national pride of our people, the gentleman turns round and says that it is humiliating to treat with Great Britain.

I shall detain the House but for a moment longer. I have not gone into the details of the working of the treaty. I have presented a general view of the subject, as it affects the Northwest, and I ask the Representatives of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the other States to look to the subject and see whether that section of the Union would not materially suffer by the abrogation of the treaty.

I propose at the proper time to move that so much of the report of the committee as provides for the giving of notice of the termination of the treaty be stricken out, so that the resolution shall simply provide for the appointment of commissioners to meet such commissioners as Great Britain may appoint, for the purpose of considering this treaty and making such modifications as time and experience shall have shown to be necessary. No time need be lost in making this attempt. We can make the attempt and see whether the evils in the treaty may not be remedied, and if we fail in that there will be time to give the notice terminating the treaty according to the provisions of the treaty itself.

So nothing will be lost if this Congress at this session passes a resolution providing for the appointment of commissioners. If those commissioners should fail to agree upon something satisfactory, then we can give the notice to terminate the treaty. But I am unwilling to see the advantages which I regard as coming from the treaty destroyed without an attempt being made to preserve them.

Sir, some of the gentlemen opposed to this treaty think it wise to inflame as far as possible the public mind against Great Britain. There has been much to provoke this in the conduct of the ruling classes of that country. And yet, in spite of all provocations, I believe the masses of the English people sympathize with us in our great contest against slavery; and I submit to gentlemen, in view of the horrors of war before our eyes, whether it is not the duty of all to refrain from exciting those national antipathies and prejudices that so often precipitate war.

I cannot forbear expressing the hope, in view of recent events, that the sober second thought of Great Britain will correct, to some extent, the wrongs of the last three years, and that the statesmen of both nations will remember that the true glory of a people is in the triumphs of civilization, intelligence, industry, and art.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, here received, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had appointed Mr. MORGAN a member of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 40) making appropriations for the consular and other diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1865, in the place of Mr. COWAN.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 15) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. MORRILL, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 20, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of John Ericsson, praying for such additional allowance on his contract to construct the two iron-clad ocean ships of war, the Dictator and Puritan, as will enable him to complete them; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of George F. Nesbitt, of New York city, praying reimbursement for losses sustained by him under his contract to furnish the Post Office Department with stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, praying for a modification of the joint resolution of the 29th of February last, imposing an additional duty of fifty per cent. on imported goods, so that goods which already paid duty on April 29 and 30, and those which remained in bond at the time of the approval of the law, may be exempted from its application; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a petition of citizens of Lawrence, Kansas, praying for the abolition of slavery throughout the United States, and for the adoption of measures for so amending the Constitution as forever to prohibit its existence in any portion of our common country; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of Israel Deming, praying to be relieved from the fulfillment of his contract to furnish rations for the marines at Washington, Philadelphia, and New York for the year 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further petitions and memorials, reports of committees are in order.

NAVAL SUPPLIES.

Mr. GRIMES. On the 14th of March last I introduced a bill in relation to naval supplies, which was printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and in the month of April reported against. I have never had an opportunity to explain the provisions of the bill to the Senate, and I therefore move that the bill be taken up with the report, in order that it may be made the special order for Monday at one o'clock; when I propose to address the Senate upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive reports of committees according to the rule.

Mr. GRIMES. I believe I am entitled to make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires reports to be called for, and the Chair will put the question on the Senator's motion as soon as the reports are through with.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 356) requiring proof of payment of duties on foreign salt before payment of the allowances provided for by the acts of July 29, 1813, and March 3, 1819, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 283) to abolish the collection districts of Port Orford and Cape Perpetua, in the State of Oregon; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 426) to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 284) to increase the efficiency of the staff of the Army; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 291) granting a pension to Esther F. Fox, widow of Augustus C. Fox, reported adversely thereon.

J. H. CLARK AND COMPANY.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 74) referring the claim of J. H. Clark & Co. to the Court of Claims, have instructed me to report back the resolution and recommend its passage. I ask that it may be put on its passage now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire the character of the claim. Is it proposed to give the Court of Claims a new jurisdiction?

Mr. POMEROY. The committee did not investigate the character of the claim. The papers were presented to the House of Representatives, and they passed this joint resolution referring the case to the Court of Claims. We merely propose to unite in passing the resolution of the House of Representatives so that it may take that direction.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that I have any objection to it, but I think we ought to know whether it is a claim for damages on account of the war, or to pay for slaves, or what it is.

Mr. POMEROY. The committee did not go into an investigation of the claim.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not suppose that I have any objection to the reference to the court; but I think we ought to know before referring the case what it is about. I do not ask for any investigation of it, but simply to know what the claim is for.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the joint resolution lying over until to-morrow that gentlemen may look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be postponed until to-morrow.

JULIA A. AMES.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 272) for the relief of Julia A. Ames, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage. This is a very meritorious case, and I think the bill will be assented to by every member of the Senate without hesitation. Mrs. Ames is the widow of a sergeant in the sixth regiment Massachusetts volunteers, who, on the 19th of April, 1861, lost his life in Baltimore. The regiment had not been mustered into service. Those of the regiment who were not killed or wounded in Baltimore came to Washington and were here mustered into service; but this man, being wounded, remained back and died; and he not having been mustered into service, his widow under the law was not entitled to a pension. That is the reason of her petition. The bill gives her the pension of a private—eight dollars a month from the 19th of April, 1861. I ask that it be acted on now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment is proposed by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOSTER. The amendment is merely to correct a clerical mistake made by the engrossing clerk in the House of Representatives. The original bill as introduced into that House and as there passed described the individual as a sergeant, but the engrossing clerk wrote "surgeon." The amendment is to strike out the word "surgeon" and insert "sergeant."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 56) to authorize the President to call out men by draft for one year; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 285) to regulate the veto power in the several Territories in the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 43) for the relief of Milo Sutliff and Levi H. Case, with the accompanying papers, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

SEIZURE OF A MINE IN ARIZONA.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the Senate by what authority the silver mine of Sylvester Mowry, in Arizona Territory, has been seized by order of General Carlton, the commander of the military department of New Mexico, and by what authority the said mine is now being worked, and what disposition is being made of the proceeds of said mine.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 477) to abolish the collection districts of Cape Perpetua and Port Orford; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 15) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had further insisted upon its disagreement to the ninth amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th June, 1865, and for other purposes, insisted on by the Senate, and upon its amendments to the seventh and eighth amendments of the Senate to the said bill, disagreed to by the Senate; and agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JUSTIN S. MORRILL of Vermont, Mr. JOHN F. FARNSWORTH of Illinois, and Mr. JOHN A. GRISWOLD of New York, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 267) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;" and it thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 139) for the relief of Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, of Coshocton county, Ohio;

An act (S. No. 197) for the relief of Charles L. Nelson;

A joint resolution (S. No. 21) to provide for the printing of official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 37) for the payment of expenses incurred by the joint committee on the conduct of the war.

NAVAL SUPPLIES.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that all prior orders be dispensed with and that we proceed to consider House bill No. 407. I perceive that although during the call of reports we are not allowed to make such a motion as this, gentlemen making reports from committees and asking for their immediate consideration overslaugh any chance of getting up any other bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark to the Senator that that is entirely within the control of the Senate. One objection carries over any report. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, the Chair will first put the question on the motion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to take up the bill referred to by him for the purpose of postponing it, as the Chair ruled that his motion was not in order at the time he made it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I yield to that as a matter of courtesy.

Mr. GRIMES. My motion was to take up the bill (S. No. 165) in relation to naval supplies. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I now move that the bill be made the special order for Monday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

MAIL SERVICE TO BRAZIL.

On motion of Mr. COLLAMER, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WILKINSON to add the following additional sections:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That whereas the Government of Venezuela, by a contract entered into on the 1st day of May, 1863, by Simon Camacho, consul for Venezuela, in the city of New York, in behalf of said Government, of the one part, and certain citizens of the United States of the other part, for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to carry the mails and ply between the city of New York and La Guayra, and other Venezuelan ports, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and empowered to accept the terms thereof on the part of the United States, so far as the same may be applicable, and to enter into a contract with the parties thereto, upon their furnishing good and sufficient sureties for the faithful performance of such contract, for carrying the mails between the ports of St. Thomas, West Indies, and La Guayra, and such other Venezuelan ports as may be deemed expedient, according to the provisions of said contract: Provided, The expense of such service to the United States shall not exceed the sum of $40,000 per year, for the performance of semi-monthly trips between said ports, to be paid out of any moneys appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department: Provided further, That the Government of Venezuela will apply and carry out in good faith the terms and conditions of said contract to the route between St. Thomas and the ports aforesaid, according to the conditions therein stipulated.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the two Governments shall be entitled to have transported, free of expense, on each and every steamer, a mail agent to take charge of and arrange the mail matter, to whom suitable accommodations for that purpose shall be assigned.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate provides for the establishment of a mail line between the ports of the United States and the empire of Brazil. It provides for letting the contract for carrying the mail in a line of steamers that are described in the bill upon the condition that the Government of Brazil will join with this Government in raising an equal subsidy for this purpose. It limits the amount to be paid by the United States toward supporting or subsidizing this line between the two countries to $150,000. It requires the steamers to touch at the island of St. Thomas.

The amendment which I offer proposes to authorize the Postmaster General to enter into a contract with certain parties who have heretofore made a contract with the Government of Venezuela for the purpose of running a line of mail steamers connecting with this one to Brazil at the island of St. Thomas, and running to La Guayra in Venezuela, and certain other ports that may be afterwards designated.

The object, I suppose, of subsidizing these lines is to open and encourage a trade between the United States and these South American Governments. I do not know any other argument that can be offered in support of this proposition of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I am inclined to think that the policy is a good one. That is the policy which the English Government has pursued, and pursued successfully, and in my opinion the United States would have been better off and more prosperous to-day in her commercial relations if she had adopted this policy more liberally some time ago.

But, Mr. President, if the argument is good in favor of the original proposition, it is equally sound as applicable to the amendment which I have offered. If it is wise for us to open commercial relations or to encourage them with the slaveholding empire of Brazil, it is more proper that we should encourage trade with the free republic of Venezuela. This amendment calls for but $40,000, and I hope it will be adopted. I do not assail the principle of the original bill; I encourage and support it; and it is upon that principle that I press this amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have made some remarks in relation to this amendment heretofore, and I wish to make them again or something like them in order to recall the subject to the minds of gentlemen.

I do not wish to be considered as expressing any opinion whether in due time and on proper occasion we ought not to establish a line to Venezuela; but this bill for the establishment of a line to Brazil has passed the House of Representatives by a very strong vote; it was before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of this body; and this project was then presented, and the committee considered it, and thought it was improper by way of amendment to this bill. An amendment, legitimately considered, is something that shall be done to a bill to effect the purpose of the bill, to make it perfect to its end. This suggestion now of making a line to Venezuela has no connection with, and is an entirely independent matter, from this bill. It is not perfecting the bill or the enterprise, but it is for a different and independent enterprise, one perhaps of some importance, but of infinitely less importance than the other.

But, sir, I have other objections to this amendment. In undertaking the initiation anew of this policy, beginning on the small scale of this Brazilian enterprise, which is only $150,000 a year, there were two features in it which the friends of this measure have been desirous to preserve. One was that we would enter into this system only with countries willing to join us in it, so as to secure the success of the enterprise. The gentleman from Minnesota insists that Venezuela is willing to do that. I will come to that directly. This project of a steam line to Brazil is put upon that condition, which is made part of the bill. The next feature was that this subsidy should not be granted as were those to the Collins line, the Sloo line, and all those, which were laws passed for particular persons, granting a subsidy to particular persons or companies, against which very much of public exception was always taken—a very vicious species of legislation always. This bill requires the Postmaster General to put out proposals and receive bids, thus opening it to the enterprise of all.

These important features of the bill are inconsistent with the amendment now offered. In the first place the amendment, if it were adopted, is impracticable; it will not effect the purposes the gentleman has in view; it cannot consistently. It alludes to a certain contract which it is said was made by Venezuela with certain individuals in this country offering to pay them so and so if they would set up a line to run between the two countries. It proposes that this line from St. Thomas to Venezuela shall be carried on under that contract. Any attempt of that kind is legislation for particular persons; nobody else can get it; it is to be done by the men who made this contract. That is utterly inconsistent with the principle of the bill.

In the next place, the contract alluded to in the amendment was a contract made with Venezuela, to run a line from Venezuela to New York direct. It is not to go to St. Thomas. By that contract they contemplated having a steam line running direct from Venezuela to New York. The whole contract was drawn upon that ground. This amendment proposes to set up a steamboat line, as under that contract, from Venezuela to St. Thomas, which is not the contract at all. The people of Venezuela might be entirely unwilling to make any arrangement by which they should have a steam line to run from St. Thomas, which is some six or seven hundred miles from the foot of the Caribbean sea, and is nearly in a right line from our eastern coast here, to the point of South America, Pernambuco, thus going out of its way. It would be seven hundred miles from there into Venezuela, from the west coast of the Caribbean sea. They might be entirely unwilling to have a steamship line set up to run out to St. Thomas, and make its connection there for New York, and make the transshipment of all the goods, wares, passengers, and everything else, and depend upon its connection with that line. That is something entirely different from what that contract with Venezuela proposes. It is not carrying out that contract at all. If anything was to be done to set up such a line to Venezuela when we get this in operation from St. Thomas, it would require, to carry out the principle adopted by the committee, that the matter should be left open to public bids, and that Venezuela should join us in it, if they have a mind to make a contract and enter into an arrangement to go to St. Thomas, about which there has been no arrangement, and is no contract whatever.

I therefore say that the amendment as drawn by the gentleman is impracticable; that even if it is practicable, it is a grant to particular individual persons, and it is an attempt to pursue a contract that does not relate to that route. Under all these circumstances I think the attempt to put it on this bill is not really a very great friendship to the bill; but at any rate, it is not germane to it, in no way amending it, and is entirely an independent and substantive matter.

Mr. WILKINSON. In case this amendment should be adopted, suppose these parties should come in and underbid to the extent of $50,000—

Mr. COLLAMER. There is to be no bidding on your proposition.

Mr. WILKINSON. I understand that; but suppose they should under the original bill, underbid any other parties who should seek to obtain the contract to transfer the mail from New York to Brazil, and should connect their line, branching off at the island of St. Thomas, and run not only with profit, so far as the carrying of the mails was concerned, but should succeed in opening trade with two countries instead of one. I suppose that these parties who have entered into this contract with Venezuela, if this amendment should be adopted, will enter into competition with the other parties who have been instrumental in urging this bill upon Congress. I suppose the real truth is, that those parties fear that these others may come in and underbid them on that contract if they are backed up by this proposition to open a trade with Venezuela, connecting at the island of St. Thomas. But if the Senate should overrule this amendment, I have another proposition to offer which will, perhaps, meet all the objections of the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The honorable Senator says that we want to open this matter to competition. We all know very well that it will not be open to competition very much; that the parties under his bill will enter into an arrangement, and I doubt very much whether it has not been done already; whether negotiations have not already been entered into between certain men who wish to put on a line of steamers there with the agents of the Brazilian Government for the very purpose of getting hold of the contract with that Government so that no other parties unless they can get a contract or enter into some stipulations can come in and bid in competition with these men. If my amendment is not right, if it does not meet the case exactly, the honorable Senator may propose an amendment to it. If it is right to open a trade with the empire of Brazil is it not equally right to open a trade with Venezuela from which we are importing coffee and many other of the necessities of life and for which we have to pay them in gold? I hope the amendment will be adopted. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Davis, Harding, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, and Wilkinson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Salsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Hale, Hicks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Riddle, Wade, and Wright—8.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILKINSON. I have here an amendment that obviates all the objections which the Senator from Vermont raised to my previous proposition. It is to add as a new section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to unite with the General Government of Venezuela, or such officer of that Government as has been or may be duly authorized to act for that Government, in establishing direct communication between the two countries by means of a semi-monthly line of first-class steamships, of not less than six hundred tons burden, to run and carry the mails between La Guayra and such other Venezuelan port or ports as may be deemed expedient, and the port of St. Thomas, connecting with the steamers of the main line herein established; and he is hereby authorized and empowered to divert from the amount herein appropriated a sum sufficient to defray the expense thereof: Provided, The same does not exceed the sum of $40,000 per annum; and he is further empowered to enter into a contract for that purpose, to submit to or accept from the Government of Venezuela proposals for the same, in the same manner and under the same restrictions as are herein contained, so far as the same may be applicable, in relation to the main line to Brazil: Provided further, That the period for advertising for proposals for the service created by this section shall terminate on or before the 25th day of June next.

This amendment does not increase the appropriation; it merely proposes to divert a portion of it to the line to Venezuela. I do not see any objection to this unless perhaps it may be to the taking of $40,000 out of the pockets of those who expect to get and who will receive the contract for the line to Brazil. That is all the effect it can have. It certainly takes not one dollar from the Treasury of the United States. It also obviates the other objection which the honorable Senator from Vermont raised to my other amendment, that it was granting a subsidy to a particular party. I hope this amendment will be adopted, because if we enter upon the policy of encouraging trade with the South American Governments, let us be equally liberal with a free Government and a free republic as with a slave empire. For my part, Mr. President, I am not over-anxious to encourage the Government of Brazil; but if this policy is to be adopted, let us encourage a republic, and a free republic, instead of encouraging a slaveholding empire in South America.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not come here today prepared on a subject of this kind to enter into a discussion of the question of slavery. It is new to me to have that question brought in on all occasions, and into matters of commerce and trade. It has no connection whatever with the bill, and can only be brought in for effect.

I again call attention to the fact that this bill was very fully considered in the House of Representatives before it was passed by that body. It is a bill to set up steam communication with Brazil. The Senator from Minnesota agrees to the propriety of it. It is so good that he wishes to put upon it a project of his own or of some of his friends, so as to make that project go through by the force of this to which he professes to be friendly. The subsidy fixed in the bill for a steam line between this country and Brazil, the distance being over five thousand miles, is exceedingly low; only $150,000 for a year. We have limited it to that, though we allow bidders to come in and make proposals within that limitation. The Senator's proposition now is to take off $40,000 of that money and use it for setting up a line to Venezuela. The exact form in which his amendment has been drawn I have not had time to consider, having heard it read but once, and not having seen it. I believe that the Senator says the line is to be put up to competition, but I did not hear any provision of that kind in the amendment.

Mr. WILKINSON. It provides that the line is to be let under the same restrictions and limitations as the main line in the original bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. But without talking about that, what is it that the gentleman proposes? It is this substantially: "The bill is good; the policy ought to be sustained; the connection with Brazil ought to be set up, and the bill is rightly drawn for that purpose; but now I want to set up another separate enterprise; and I desire, in order to recommend it to the Senate on the ground that it will not cost the Government anything, to take $40,000 out of the amount provided by the bill for that purpose." That is it. It is that the low amount fixed in the bill shall be reduced $40,000, in order to set up some other enterprise, and thus defeat the whole. I do not wish to say anything more about it.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendment agreed to was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. GRIMES. On the passage of the bill I desire to have the yeas and nays. I am not satisfied that at this time the country is prepared to embark in an enterprise of this sort, and pay out $150,000 a year for the establishment of a steam line between this country and Brazil. I desire, therefore, to record my name against it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I stated the other day why I thought this bill ought not to pass. I have no disposition now to repeat what I then said, further than to call the attention of Senators to what the bill is—I hope sufficient attention has been paid to it—to see that we are about embarking in an enterprise which may involve the country in many millions of dollars. I submit whether, if it be proper at any time for the Government of the United States to undertake to maintain steam communication by appropriations from the Treasury between this country and foreign nations, this is the proper time. I doubt the policy of it at any time. We once undertook it in a time of peace and failed and gave it up; and now it is proposed in the midst of a war requiring all the energies of this people and Government to raise the necessary means to carry it on, to embark in a scheme of ocean steamships to South America, and to appropriate money to initiate the enterprise at this time. I hope the Senate will not pass this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall occupy the time of the Senate but for a moment. I am a little surprised at the remarks of the honorable Senator from Illinois. We did once enter upon this policy, and we entered upon it in a very different manner from that in which we propose to enter upon it now. We gave a subsidy to a particular line, to a particular man, and for a particular service. The difference between that policy and this is, that here we propose exposing this service to the competition of our people by giving the subsidy to be granted to the lowest responsible bidder. I follow the remark of the Senator from Illinois, that we once established this policy and we abandoned it, by saying that we did abandon it, and when we abandoned it we abandoned the commerce of the world to the English and French. The commerce of our time is carried by steam, and the oceans and seas of the world are occupied by the steamships of other nations and not ours. We complain because there is to be a grant made of $150,000 annually. Why, sir, your quartermaster's department in any section of the country, I venture to say, consumes ten times the amount without any account being made of it. If we are to be restricted in our national policy, in a policy comprehending the trade and commerce of the country, by considerations of this kind, I submit that this is not the time, though we be engaged in a war, to impose that restriction. I hope that this bill will pass.

Mr. COLLAMER. I made some remarks the other day in relation to the nature and character of this enterprise, and I do not expect to command attention to any long remarks about it now. I do not believe in the idea that we are to abandon all possibility of doing any good by any sort of legislation except as connected with this war. We may still be of some use to the country. The enterprise which is now proposed is the most favorable one, and is recommended by men who best understand the commerce of the country as being the one which we can initiate with the least expense and which promises the greatest advantage to the country. On that point I will present a comparative statement from the statistics in relation to Brazil.

In 1851, at the time when the British set up their steam line to Brazil, their exports to Brazil amounted to $17,593,420; in 1860, after their steam line had been in operation eight years, their exports to Brazil were $22,233,880. The exports into Great Britain from Brazil were in 1851 $14,463,755; and in 1860, when they were carrying to Brazil about $5,000,000 more than in 1851, their imports from Brazil were $11,345,900, being a decrease of $3,122,855 since 1851, making the difference in favor of Great Britain in that trade for that period of eight years $7,763,315.

Now compare our trade with Brazil with that of England and see how it stands. In 1851 we imported from Brazil $11,525,304 and in 1860 $21,214,803, making an increase of $9,689,499, or over $1,000,000 per year. In 1860 we imported from Brazil $21,214,803 when the English imported but $11,000,000. In 1851, when the British carried to Brazil $17,000,000 of their manufactures and supplies, we carried $3,000,000. The comparative difference against us in that period of time on our trade with Brazil was $6,873,220, whereas the gain to England in the same time on her trade with Brazil was $7,763,315. When the English line to Brazil commenced we stood very near on an equal footing with them in the trade with Brazil, and now we see the result. We take coffee from Brazil and pay for it by drafts on London, and we have to send the gold there to meet them. The British pay for their goods from us in that manner, so that the amount of it is that we pay for their manufactured goods instead of their taking them from us, in consequence of there being free, constant, and reliable intercourse between England and Brazil. That is all there is to it. Now, the question is, must we endure this throughout the world and forever to the destruction of our commerce?

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must call up the order of the day at this hour.

Mr. COLLAMER. Cannot a vote be taken on this bill?

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall come to a vote.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not wish to take up more time. Let us vote.

Mr. HOWARD. I am willing to yield for the purpose of allowing a vote to be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill may be proceeded with by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont when he reads these tables and tells us how much our commerce with Brazil has fallen off—

Mr. COLLAMER. No; how much the balance is against us.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to inquire if he is quite certain that it is all owing to the fact that we have got no line of steamers to Brazil.

Mr. COLLAMER. I verily believe so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator believes that, and he supposes that other circumstances regulating the commerce of the world may not have entered into this, but that it is all owing to the fact that we have not had a line of steamers. I am not disposed to take up time by going into a discussion of such a question, but I suppose there may be a thousand causes which increase or diminish the intercourse between different nations, other than simply the convenience or advantage which one nation may have over another by having a line of steamers.

I am not disposed to protract this matter. My only object was to call the attention of the Senate to the bill, that every Senator may decide for himself whether he believes that this is the time to embark in a scheme like this, which is the intention, we are told, of a larger scheme.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman puts his question to me as if he desired an answer. Now, I can inform him that I have before me a letter from our former consul at Rio Janeiro, stating that the reason is what I have assigned; and I believe, on that point, I may appeal to the personal knowledge of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW,] who has been there, and who has been familiar personally with the condition of affairs in Brazil and of our trade with that country. If the Senator from Illinois would look over the book to which I have referred him before and which I have before me, the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York on this subject, it must present the question to him or any man who will condescend to examine it in such a manner as to show that this very thing is essentially and mainly the occasion of the balance of trade being so greatly against us.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Illinois asked the question why we should embark in this policy at this moment. There is one reply which I choose to give now. We are about to impose additional taxation upon the country. We need all the resources we can command in our Treasury; and in order to enlarge those resources we must in every practicable way enlarge our commerce. The Senator from Vermont has, by his statistics, very happily explained to us that at this moment we send to Brazil some six million dollars a year and receive over twenty million. Is not the Senator from Illinois desirous of filling up that difference between six and twenty million by exports from our country, thus saving our gold at home, as the Senator from Vermont suggests, and to that extent quickening our commerce and enlarging the field of its operations, and by quickening our commerce and enlarging the field of its operations also enlarging the field of taxation? I allude to that now because the Senate will in a few days enter upon the consideration of the subject of taxation. We shall be looking around to find new sources of income, and now I suggest one very considerable source of income which we can open by a very slight advance of our commerce.

The Senator from Illinois, however, inquires whether we are sure that by establishing a line of steamers we shall enlarge our commerce. I do not know that anybody can reply positively to that question, but the reasonable inference is, if we follow at all what has occurred in England, we shall in that way enlarge our commerce. I believe we shall enlarge it very considerably. In point of fact, Brazil and the United States, owing to the absence of any steam line of communication, are now very far apart. The ordinary way of reaching Brazil at this moment from New York is by way of Europe. Only last week, the Brazilian minister, leaving Washington on his return to his own country, was obliged to go via Europe; and our own minister there, when he left here some three years ago, went in the same way, via Europe.

It seems that the considerations in favor of this comparatively small outlay, when I consider the great good that may be secured, are unanswerable.

Mr. GRIMES. The book to which the Senator from Vermont referred the Senator from Illinois, namely, the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, not only proposes to establish this line, as I understand, but proposes also to establish one to Australia, and a direct line to China and Japan. If it be a substantial reason in favor of the establishment of this line of steamers that our minister to Brazil is compelled to find his port of destination at present through England, is it not as substantial a reason in favor of establishing a line to Japan, because Mr. Pruyn is now obliged to go to Japan via Suez or Egypt, or some other foreign country? It seems to me that the same argument that the Senator from Massachusetts applies to the case of Brazil would apply with equal force to the cases of China and Japan, for neither Mr. Burlingame nor Mr. Pruyn can go to Canton or Jeddo by an American line of steamers.

But, sir, what I rose for was to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads whether if this bill passes, as doubtless it will, it is to be followed by another bill, in pursuance of the recommendation of the New York Chamber of Commerce, in favor of those two other lines of steamers. I should like to know before we vote upon this bill, and I think it would be desirable for the Senate and the country to know, how far we are likely to carry it, and what is likely to be the annual expenditure of the Government in this direction for the purpose of promoting commerce, and, as he says, keeping gold at home.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will say that if the gentleman will read the memorial through I fancy he will hardly think that it will furnish objection for what seems to be rather a captious objection to this bill. He looked to one page and found one or two projects that he lays hold of. It is not true that the Chamber of Commerce recommend establishing all those lines at the present time. They do recommend this one as being one which can be done now, opening our commerce with a very important country, and where we may have a fair chance of getting in a great measure the control of the trade. They think this is one that ought to be begun now; and whenever we have tried the experiment and can show by our own experience from this little experiment we make here that there is a reasonable probability in a similar condition of things to encourage us to begin other enterprises, probably we shall begin them, but not until we have tried this.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am in favor of this bill, and I am somewhat at a loss to see upon what ground the honorable members on the other side can consistently be opposed to it. They are apprehensive, I am told, that the appropriation may lead to still larger and more important appropriations in the end, and they are particularly opposed to it because of the time when this measure comes before us. Why, sir, we have passed bills at this session for the benefit of the West, giving millions and millions of acres of land away, which might be made a fruitful source of revenue, which it has been proposed even now should be used exclusively for the purpose of revenue. We have now before us a bill to make a railroad from here to the other ocean, and I think they are almost all in favor of it, and that gives millions and millions of acres more; and it not only does that, but it pledges the credit of the Government for millions and millions of dollars. That benefits the West, the whole country between the two oceans. Why should not the Atlantic be entitled to some favor?

I feel, nationally, Mr. President, that our country is somewhat in dishonor from the fact that it has no ocean line of steamers. The experiment that we made for a time injured very extensively to the credit of the Government. It was perhaps badly managed; but the effect of its abandonment has been that the whole steam navigation upon the ocean is in the hands of other Governments; even the trade which we have between our own country and England and France and Germany is carried on exclusively by foreign steamers, not only inuring greatly to the benefit of the proprietors of those steamers, but inuring still more to the benefit of the countries themselves whose patriotism and whose enlightened enterprise have led them to foster those lines; and at this time it would seem to me to be particularly appropriate that we should make some effort to do something for the commerce of the country. There is hardly now upon the ocean an American vessel carried by wind and tide because of this war, and the only chance we have is to encourage lines of steamers beginning with the project recommended by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, who will be enabled to escape from the corsairs of the sea that are depredating on our marine.

I do not know how other Senators feel, but I repeat, Mr. President, that I feel somewhat degraded in a national sense when I remember that the whole trade of the world, as far as it is carried on by means of steam navigation, is in the hands of other Governments. Here is an appropriation of $150,000 a year. What is that? We are spending every day, for projects not calculated even to do as much good as this is sure to effect, twice that sum. I think it is no answer to say that we have the war upon us. We are in a very bad condition if we are not able to carry on this war and protect our own commerce. We are unable to protect it upon the sea because of the magnitude of the oceans, in a great measure, against rebel privateering; but we are able to foster it, if we think proper to foster it, by means of a commercial steam marine which can escape these depredators upon our commerce.

I was at one time familiar with the statistics of the trade between South America and the United States, and particularly between Brazil and the United States. I have them not now fresh in my recollection, but the trade was enormous; and the wealth which it now pours into the lap of England and of France can hardly be counted. Let us make an effort to get a part of it at least.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not responsible, Mr. President, for any allusions to localities in connection with this subject in this debate. It is the Senator from Maryland who has introduced that topic, and he seems to speak of those who are opposed to the passage of this bill as being from the West. Now, sir, for one, being a representative of one western State, I am willing to compare records with the Senator from Maryland on that subject, so far as my record extends back, though it does not go so far as his. I think I have done as much and voted as often in favor of increasing and extending the commerce of the country as any man here, and I am willing to continue to do so. I am one of those who believe that this nation cannot be a nation that is worthy of the name, and an independent and free nation, without having a large commerce, and having it thoroughly and completely protected at home and abroad, and I have always so voted here in the Senate.

So far as my State is concerned, and so far as the grants of land that have been made to it are concerned, let me tell the Senator that we have paid from that State many millions of dollars into the national Treasury more than the soil ever cost the nation—many millions of dollars more than the original purchase and all the cost of survey and supporting the public offices upon it, taking no account of the amount of public land that has been used up in land scrip or land warrants furnished to the soldiers from the East and from the West who were engaged in the Mexican war.

My objection to this bill is that I cannot see what practical good is going to result to the country from its passage at this time. I do not see where the commerce is to-day with Brazil that you are going to encourage. I think it is hardly fair—I do not say so in any improper sense—I do not think it is proper for us to take the tables of trade between this country and Brazil for 1860 and 1861, before the war existed, and to ask us to pass a bill in 1864 on the basis of that trade. Is not our trade with Brazil modified by the passage of our tariff laws, by the passage of our tax laws, and by the existence of war here? Can any member of this body, or anybody else, intelligently decide how the passage of this bill is going to affect that trade hereafter, by reference to what the trade was in 1859 or 1860 or 1861? If he can, he has a good deal more penetration than I have. I have been told by those who I supposed had looked into it that in consequence of the war, in consequence of the high tariff upon coffee, our trade with Brazil had fallen off almost entirely. Perhaps the Senator from Vermont can tell me what was the amount of coffee we imported in 1863?

Mr. COLLAMER. We have not got the returns for that year.

Mr. GRIMES. In 1862?

Mr. COLLAMER. I cannot give the figures now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can say that the importations of coffee are not more than half what they were at the commencement of the war.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that the imports of coffee have fallen off one half. Almost all the coffee of this country is imported from Rio. We are the people who use the coffee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator must not understand me as saying that the exportation from Brazil has fallen off. I mean that our imports have fallen off.

Mr. GRIMES. Exactly; I understand the Senator; in other words, the commerce between us and Brazil has fallen off, for coffee is almost the only article that we import from Brazil.

The Senator from Maryland says that he feels humiliated at the fact that the commerce of the country has passed out of American hands and gone into those of foreigners; and he tells us, what is the fact, that to-day almost all if not all the steamships that ply between American ports and the ports of Europe are owned by foreigners. I think he would also bear testimony to the fact that nearly all of them are in some way or other subsidized—I understand him to assent to that proposition—and that it is necessary they should be subsidized in order to carry on that trade. Does the Senator from Maryland take the ground; and is that the theory upon which we are to vote hereafter—I want to understand what is desired of us; does he recommend, and is that principle embodied in this bill?—that we, in order to compete for the commerce of the world, shall subsidize steamships?

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator want an answer now?

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what are the Senator's views on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. I believe most of those steamers receive compensation in some form or other from their respective Governments.

Mr. COLLAMER and Mr. FESSENDEN. All of them.

Mr. JOHNSON. All, I believe; and that is one of the reasons why individual enterprise cannot compete with them. If they were not subsidized, American individual enterprise would be sufficient.

Mr. GRIMES. What I want to know of the Senator is whether he desires and proposes that this Government shall subsidize vessels to compete with those?

Mr. JOHNSON. To a reasonable extent I certainly would agree to that policy.

Mr. GRIMES. Then the Senate can understand exactly to what we are drifting. If in order to compete with the commerce of other countries we are to subsidize all the vessels that persons may desire to run as steam packets between New York or any eastern port and foreign ports, I think it will be necessary for the Committee on Finance to increase the rate of taxation proposed by the tax bill that has come to us from the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I think it is quite impossible to defend this bill against the arguments of the Senator from Iowa. He opposes it first because he is opposed to giving a subsidy at this time to any line. He next turns to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and asks him if he does not intend in future to subsidize and establish some other line. He is then opposed to this bill because it subsidizes a line now; and he is opposed to it again because it will lead to the subsidizing of another line; and finally, he is opposed to the subsidizing of any line. Now, I submit that the Senator's arguments cover the whole subject so completely that the bill is entirely indefensible against them.

Sir, I beg to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that to-day we have but one line of American ocean steamers that is respectable in character, and that is the ocean line to California. I say respectable; I mean in the amount of capital invested, and in the regularity with which the business is carried on. How came that line? Was it not a subsidized line? Would it ever have had existence had it not been a subsidized line? When the Government of the United States wisely provided for the establishment of the line to Aspinwall, or to Chagres, as it was then, and then from Panama to San Francisco and Astoria, there was not an ounce of gold exported from the Pacific coast, and the discovery of gold on that coast was not thought of. The object of establishing the line was to grasp and seize the commerce of the new region and take it at its beginning, control it, own it. Has a line of British steamers ever successfully competed with that line up to this time? When gold was discovered on the Pacific slope that line of steamers was in existence. How would the people of this country have reached that favored land but for the act of the Government in establishing that line? The Government not only subsidized the line when it was established, but has continued to subsidize it to this very hour. The Government has continually paid it large sums of money for carrying its mails and transporting its munitions and its men. It is the only respectable line in point of extent and the amount of capital invested that belongs to the American nation to-day.

And yet gentlemen combat this as a national policy. The Senator from Iowa does not like it because the Senator from Maryland runs a parallel between the policy inaugurated by this bill and the establishment of the Pacific railroad across the continent. It is singular at least that the opposition to this policy should come mainly from gentlemen representing constituencies in the center of the continent, or lying near it; and I confess that it is particularly surprising to me that any part of that opposition should come from the honorable and enlightened Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.] Why, sir, what do the people of Illinois demand to-day more than anything else? They demand the construction of a national ship canal, a connection between the Atlantic ocean and the great rivers and arteries of the interior, that shall make us independent, and enable us to preserve ourselves against foreign invasions upon our northern lakes and at our inland ports. The voice that comes from his State for the initiation and carrying out of that policy is not to be mistaken; and I tell the Senator here to-day that when the scheme is presented in a practical form, it will have support from me, for I do not think there is any measure which has yet been contemplated by the American people so necessary as that.

The Senator smiles. I do not instance the case as illustrating the inconsistency of the Senator. The Senator is doubtless consistent with himself in opposing this measure. But let me address myself to an indication given by the Senator from Iowa, when he asked the Senator from Vermont to answer him as to whether there is not another measure coming, namely, the one indicated in the pamphlet lying upon the Senator's desk, from the New York Chamber of Commerce. I ask the Senator from Iowa if, when a measure is proposed to establish and subsidize a line of steamers to connect San Francisco with the ports of Japan and China, and to control and possess that trade, he is determined to oppose it, and whether he is disposed to advertise that opposition at this time in advance of its introduction? I think he had better wait until such a measure is introduced. Such a measure will find no advocacy from me, nor, I apprehend, from any other Senators, unless the merits of the case demand it. For what, I would ask, are we constructing a railroad to connect the Pacific and the Atlantic oceans? Is it merely to control and facilitate our internal commerce? Does it not contemplate reaching farther out and controlling the commerce of the Indies? Yes, sir, let us go on, not resolving that because the Collins line was a failure, we will drop this policy and will not pursue it, until we shall not have a ship upon the ocean able to sustain itself with the nations of the world. The point made by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Maryland is conclusive in this case. Our commerce has been driven from nearly every sea, and it is only that portion of it which is carried on by means of fast and swift steamships, able either to fight or to run, from which we can expect its continuance.

I hope, sir, that this bill will pass, not for the inauguration of a system of extravagant legislation, but for the inauguration of an economical and enlightened and a most profitable policy, to be followed up judiciously and carefully wherever it shall be found to be a good investment for the American people.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWARD. Do you want to go on now?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If this subject is to be continued, I desire to say something upon it. In spite of my disinclination to go into a discussion on this bill, the remarks made by some gentlemen are so extraordinary that I think they should be replied to; but I will not insist upon going on now if the Senator from Michigan wishes to call up his bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well, I will go on at some other time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Michigan that undoubtedly in twenty minutes we shall be able to dispose of this bill. Probably, after the honorable Senator from Illinois replies, we can take the vote and finish the matter at once.

Mr. HOWARD. I leave it to the honorable

Senator from Illinois to make his remarks now if he chooses.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall make no promises in regard to the time that may be consumed in this discussion. I did not intend to enter at any length into the discussion of this matter, and am not prepared to do so, and would rather have it go over to enable me to look more thoroughly into it; but if its consideration is to be continued, I have something to say upon it now.

Mr. HOWARD. Under the circumstances I must insist on proceeding to the order of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor.) The order of the day, the Pacific railroad bill, is now before the Senate.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the permission of the Senator from Michigan having charge of that bill, I desire to call up a resolution of inquiry that I introduced on Tuesday last. It will take but a moment to dispose of it. It is a resolution of inquiry calling for information that I desire to have before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate a statement showing the full amount of the public debt of the United States at the present date; and that in making said statement he cause to be arranged separately the several items of said indebtedness; under what law each item occurred, whether it bears interest, and if so, whether in coin or lawful money; the amount of Treasury notes, United States notes, fractional currency, certificates of indebtedness, temporary loans, &c., and the rate of interest, if any, paid on each of said items, with the date and title of the act under which each class was issued.

The resolution was adopted.

BANK REPORTS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offered another resolution on the same day, concerning certain bank reports, which I should be glad to have acted upon now.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate copies of the full reports of the banks, associations, corporations, and individuals doing a banking business, which are required to be made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863; and that in communicating said reports he be requested to cause those required to be made within thirty days after the first day of October, 1863, and those required to be made six months thereafter, to be arranged in separate tables.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator that instead of the full reports abstracts will be sufficient. We do not want the full reports. That would cover all the letters from the banks, &c., which are entirely unnecessary. The Senator can obtain all the information he desires in an abstract.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe the Senator is correct. An abstract showing the amount of circulation, &c., is all that I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

LAND TITLES IN DENVER CITY.

Mr. HARLAN. With the consent of the Senator from Michigan, I will ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 432, for the relief of the citizens of Denver, in the Territory of Colorado. The Delegate from that Territory tells me that the people of that town are on the point of civil war on account of the difficulties in procuring titles to their town property. This bill is intended to enable them to do so.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to extend the provisions of an act for the relief of the citizens of towns upon the lands of the United States, under certain circumstances, approved May 23, 1844, so as to authorize the probate judge of Arapaho county, in the Territory of Colorado, to enter, at the minimum price, in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants of the town of Denver, the following legal subdivisions of land, or such portions thereof as are settled and occupied, for town purposes, to wit: section No. 33, and the west half of section No. 34 in township No. 3 south, of range No. 68 west, of the sixth principal meridian; but there are to be reserved from such sale and entry such blocks or lots in the town of Denver as may be necessary for Government purposes, to be designated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The second section provides that in all respects, except as modified by this act, the probate judge and his successors in office are to be governed by the provisions of the act of May 23, 1844.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with amendments, the first of which was in section one, line nine, to strike out the words "occupants of the town of Denver" and to insert "rightful occupants of said land and the bona fide owners of the improvements thereon, according to their respective interests."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line thirteen, before the word "occupied" to insert the word "actually," and in line fourteen after the word "purposes" to insert "by the town of Denver aforesaid;" so that the clause will read:

The following legal subdivisions of land, or such portions thereof as are settled and actually occupied for town purposes by the town of Denver aforesaid, to wit, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line two, after the word "modified" to strike out the words "the said probate judge and his successors in office shall be governed," and to insert "the execution of the foregoing provisions shall be controlled;" and at the end of the section to add "and the rules and regulations of the Commissioner of the General Land Office;" so that the section will read:

That in all respects, except as herein modified, the execution of the foregoing provisions shall be controlled by the provisions of said act of 23d of May, 1844, and the rules and regulations of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 132) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, the pending question being on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad as amended.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to offer some amendments relating more particularly to the phraseology of the committee's amendment. In section twenty, line sixty-four, I move to strike out the words "being wholly or in part incomplete or unconstructed," and to insert, "shall not have constructed the number of miles of its said road within the time herein required;" so that the clause will read:

And in case, upon the completion by such consolidated organization of the roads or either of them, of the companies so consolidated, any other of the road or roads of either of the other companies authorized as aforesaid, (and forming or intended or necessary to form a portion of a continuous line from each of the several points on the Missouri river, hereinbefore designated, to the Pacific coast,) shall not have constructed the number of miles of its said road within the time herein required, such consolidated organization is hereby authorized to continue the construction of its road and telegraph in the general direction and route upon which such incomplete or unconstructed road is hereinbefore authorized to be built, &c.

That will give perspicuity and clearness to the language.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In the same section, line seventy-one, after the word "therewith" I move to insert the following words:

At the expense of said company which is in default, at the actual value of such work, to be estimated by competent engineers, subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. HARLAN. I am opposed to that amendment. I had prepared an amendment to this same section that I will submit to the Senate, and ask the Senator to allow his amendment to go over until he hears the amendment I have prepared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan withdraw his amendment to the amendment for the time being?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARLAN. Then I move to amend the amendment in section twenty, line eighty-one, after the word "thereto," by inserting:

And said consolidated company shall pay the said defaulting company the value, to be estimated by competent engineers, of all the work done and material furnished by said defaulting company which may be adopted and used by said consolidated company in the progress of the work under the provisions of this section: Provided, nevertheless, That said defaulting company may at any time before receiving pay for its said work and material as hereinbefore provided, on its election, pay said consolidated company the value of the work done and the material furnished by said consolidated company, to be estimated by competent engineers, necessary for and used in the construction of the road of said defaulting company, and resume the control of its said road.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move further to amend the amendment in section one, line twenty, after the word "from," by striking out the following words:

A point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Smoky Hill fork of the Republican or Kansas river in the State of Kansas.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

A point on the western boundary of the State of Iowa, to be fixed by the President of the United States, if not heretofore fixed, as the terminus of the so-called Iowa branch of the Union Pacific railroad, under the law amended by this act, upon the most direct and practicable route, to be subject to his approval, to a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich between the south margin of the valley of the Republican river.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to hear some reason given by the honorable Senator from Iowa for this very important amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, two years ago, when the bill was pending which is now a law, after a protracted discussion, the Senate fixed on the one hundredth meridian, between the south valley of the Republican fork of the Kansas river and the north valley of the Platte river, as a starting point for the main line of the road. There were Senators here at that time who desired to have the starting point further south, and others that desired to have it further north. There are those in the northern States who believe that the running water one hundred miles north of the Platte would furnish a better line than either the Platte or Kansas rivers. But after full discussion, after hours of debate here, the Senate agreed on the point which I have recited in this amendment. This amendment proposes to leave the law as it now stands, where the Senate and Congress fixed it two years ago, giving the company the latitude of country between the south border of the Republican fork of the Kansas river and the north border of the Platte river.

The other part of the amendment will make the starting point of the Pacific railroad on the western border of Iowa, where the Iowa branch now is fixed by the President under the law as it exists. I see no propriety in having two distinct laws embodied in the same bill for constructing substantially the same road. As the bill now stands, it provides that the Union Pacific railroad shall build a railroad from the one hundredth meridian of west longitude to the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada, and from the one hundredth meridian east to the eastern boundary of Iowa. The point is fixed now by the President of the United States, under the law as it stands. It seems to me it would simplify the bill to embrace the whole line in the same provision. This is all there is in the amendment that I have offered.

Mr. HOWARD. The committee that reported this amendment or substitute to the Senate have enlarged the line upon the one hundredth degree of west longitude, which is to be the starting point of the main trunk. Under the act of 1862 the place of departure was to be upon that line of longitude and was to be at some point to be fixed by the President of the United States between the north margin of the valley of the Platte river and the south margin of the valley of the Republican river. I do not know whether the President of the United States has fixed and ascertained the point of departure upon that one hundredth degree of longitude. It may be that he has done so; some Senator here perhaps will be able to inform us; but it is immaterial whether he has or not. The committee thought it best to allow a larger space for the selection of the initial point of the road upon the one hundredth degree, and for this reason: they were informed by persons who had been engaged in making explorations in that region of country that the probable route proceeding westwardly from the point contemplated by the act of 1862 would be found to be destitute of timber, wood, coal, and iron ores, and that this destination would be in fact a very great disadvantage to the company itself, making it necessary to transport the vast quantities of timber which they would be compelled to use in the construction of their road for a very great distance, and the same as to other heavy materials which they will be compelled to use; whereas they seem to have formed the idea that by selecting the initial point on that one hundredth degree of longitude at a more southerly point they would go into a region where they would find plenty of timber useful for the construction of the road, and probably plenty of coal and plenty of iron also. It is manifest to every one that if this road could be built through a region of country where there would be plenty of these articles, timber, iron, and coal, it would be a very great saving to the company and would enhance the value of its stock.

These are the only motives which have influenced the committee in changing the initial point, giving it a larger margin upon the one hundredth meridian. It is for the Senate to say whether it is best to allow them this additional margin. I think it is, so far as I have been advised; but I shall not make any point upon it. I leave that entirely to the better judgment of the Senate.

One word, sir, as to the commencement of the Pacific line of road. I believe the amendment of the honorable Senator from Iowa contemplates that the Union Pacific railroad line shall commence on the western boundary of Iowa.

Mr. HARLAN. Just where the branch road now commences.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that amendment will not be made. It will involve the necessity of changing the phraseology of the bill throughout. It will require a revision and almost a reconstruction of the bill in order to make its language and provisions adapt themselves to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. There is really no need of it whatever. The corporation created in 1862 by the act of that year is directed to construct a railroad from the one hundredth degree of west longitude westwardly to the Pacific coast, or rather to the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada. Then the same charter proceeds to declare that the same corporation shall be required to construct sundry branches, and among these branches is the one running north westwardly and terminating upon the western line of the State of Iowa. It is very true it will be a part of the Pacific railroad; but I object to the introduction of that amendment because it will derange the other provisions of the bill and render necessary a complete reconstruction and recomposition, perhaps, of the bill itself.

I hope, therefore, that the honorable Senator from Iowa will not press that part of his amendment. It is a question of mere description and phraseology.

Mr. POMEROY. That portion of the Senator's amendment which makes the main line start from the western boundary of Iowa, I think, is entirely against the spirit of the bill as we agreed upon it in the last Congress; because it was agreed that on the one hundredth meridian the various branches should come together; that east of that one hundredth meridian they should all be branches. It would be manifestly very unjust to the branches that have the right to connect on this one hundredth meridian to construct and consolidate the main line down to the State of Iowa. I know very well that the Union Pacific Railroad Company building the main line from the State of Iowa and owning the main line from the State of Iowa will of course feel a deep interest in having the freight, passage, and travel continued throughout the whole length of the main line; but we have provided in this bill that these various companies shall unite upon equal terms, and, in order to do that, there should be some agreement that they should unite; and the bill does make that upon the one hundredth meridian. If you extend the main line down to the State of Iowa it is against the entire compromises in reference to these branches that we entered into in the last Congress and against the bill as it is now drawn. I certainly hope that that portion of the Senator's amendment will be abandoned or voted down.

In regard to the other branch of the amendment I have not much to say. I do not think it is of very great importance. I have always thought that the Saline river was the best one for this road to go up. I said so in the last Congress. I think it is for the interest of my State, at any rate, that the line should go up one of those streams. The difficulty to which I will call the attention of the chairman of the committee is this: we incorporate a company to build a road only in the Territories. The Smoky Hill and the Saline rivers are both in a State, and under the decision that we made in the last Congress that Congress could not incorporate a company to run through or in a State we abandoned the idea of going up the Smoky Hill or the Saline river and allowed the connection to be on the Republican or Platte, in a Territory. It was supposed that Congress could not incorporate a company that should run one foot of road in a State except by the permission of the laws of that State or the consent of the Legislature of that State. That was the reason why we were defeated in this in the last Congress.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator from Kansas, or any other Senator, deems that part of the amendment changing the phraseology so as to commence the road at the Missouri river instead of commencing it one or two hundred miles out in the plains objectionable, I am willing to return to the old phraseology, if they will allow the phraseology to remain throughout as it now is. If they are willing to permit the law to stand as it now exists in relation to the starting point I am content.

But, as the Senator himself has well remarked, it was insisted here by some of the best lawyers in the country, two years ago, that Congress had no right to create a corporation to build a railroad within the limits of a State. The law as it now stands does not provide for the construction of one foot of road by the Union Pacific Railroad Company through any State. The amendment to the bill as proposed by the committee does provide that this road may start about midway in the State of Kansas and be built one hundred miles or so through that State. It seems to me that it would simplify the bill to provide for the commencement of the Pacific railroad on the navigable waters of the Missouri river; to provide that they may build out from the river until they arrive at a point on the one hundredth meridian, to be determined by the President of the United States, between the south border of the valley of the Republican fork and the northern border of the valley of the Platte. It seems to me it would avoid an absurdity in the language that strikes the mind of every individual; and as the same company is required to build both ends of the road, from the one hundredth meridian westward, and from the one hundredth meridian eastward, it seems to me it cannot damage any other corporation in the least.

The suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas, that the law requires that all branch roads shall be required to connect on equal terms, will not affect the interests of the east end of the Union Pacific railroad line in the least, because it is to be owned by the Union Pacific Railroad Company itself in either event, whether this amendment shall prevail or not; though, as I have before remarked, I do not deem it material and shall not insist upon it, if Senators will permit the law on that subject to remain as it now exists.

In relation to the point of fact suggested by the chairman of the committee, I beg leave to differ with him. There may be more timber on the Smoky Hill fork of the Kansas river, which I understand is the main channel of the Kansas river, than on the Platte river; but that is a question that has never been settled. There is no body of timber on either river. The timber that is to be found is to be found on the lateral branches of those streams. Away from the valleys, up in the hills, you will find cedar and pine to some extent in the vicinity of both these streams; but one hundred miles north, on the running waters of the Niobrara, there is a large body of pine timber; so that if the Senator is in search of timber he ought to go one hundred miles north, where the timber exists. But this whole subject was discussed in the Senate two years ago, and it was then the judgment of the Senate and the judgment of Congress that the point of departure should be fixed on that margin between the two rivers named in the law. This is the language of the law as it now stands:

"And the said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph, with the appurtenances, from a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the Republican river and the north margin of the valley of the Platte river, in the Territory of Nebraska, to the western boundary of Nevada Territory."

Thus avoiding the question suggested by the Senator from Kansas of the doubtful power of Congress to organize a corporation to build a railroad through a State, and also fixing the departing point within reasonable limits so as to accommodate the system of railroads through the States east of the Missouri river. I think that a question that has been thus settled after long and protracted discussion in both branches of Congress ought to remain so. Nevertheless, if it is to be thrown open, I am in favor of correcting the whole evil, if an evil does really exist.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If I understand the Senator from Iowa his objection is to extending the boundaries to the Smoky Hill fork of the Kansas river.

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He is willing to leave it between the south margin of the valley of the Kansas river in the State of Kansas and the north margin of the valley of the Platte river; but his objection is that we ought not to extend the limits of the initial point of this road.

Mr. HARLAN. Exactly. With the leave of the Senate, on the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas that he is content to leave this question as the law now fixes it, I will modify my amendment by striking out in line twenty-three of the first section the words "Smoky Hill fork of the," and after the word "Republican" to strike out the word "or" and insert the words "fork of the," and after the word "river" to strike out the words "in the State of Kansas;" so that the clause will read:

And said company is hereby authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, finish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph, with the appurtenances thereto, from a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Republican fork of the Kansas river and the north margin of the Platte river, in the Territory of Nebraska, &c.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is not the way the old law stood.

Mr. HARLAN. It is substantially the same, I think.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why not put it in the very words?

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to that; but I will remark to the Senator from Illinois that it is repeated twice in the old law, and I think the bill as I now propose to amend it will conform to the phraseology in one of the places where it occurs exactly. I am sure it does to the sense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to be strenuous on this subject. I simply wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact, which I have already stated, that gentlemen connected with this enterprise have regarded this extension of the length of the initial line, so to speak, as of considerable importance on account of the probability of their finding plenty of timber and coal on a more southern route. I simply wish to state this to Senators in order that they may know as much as I do about it. If after that they see fit to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, I have nothing further to say. It seems to me we had better retain the language of the bill as it is.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will not be adopted. When the Pacific railroad bill was pending two years ago I proposed an amendment which would have made that bill similar to the bill now proposed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I desired then, if I possibly could, to secure the possibility of building this road on the Smoky Hill fork, and I will state my reasons. I stated them then, and I will restate them now in a very few words.

Mr. President, this is a proposition to fix the eastern terminus of the Pacific railroad proper.

That is the part of it that is to be specially built under a charter from the Government. I stated then, and I restate the proposition now, that unless my information be incorrect, the proper route on which to build that road is upon the Solomon river or the Smoky Hill fork. The difference between the south margin of the Republican fork of the Kansas river and the north margin of the Smoky Hill fork would not vary more than twenty-five or thirty miles; perhaps not over twenty at several points. I ask the Senate then in all seriousness, if the Smoky Hill fork should be found to be the best route on which to build this road, why should we confine it a little north of that point? I do not desire to confine it within any given point. The fact is, if I had my way about it I would leave a much larger margin on which to build this road. If it be found best to put it north, I certainly shall not object to it.

My impression is that this road will have to be built ultimately by the way of Denver. There is an immense settlement at Denver, in the Territory of Colorado. We all know the very great importance in the construction of a road, if we intend to build it cheaply, of building it through settlements. Not only do we know the importance of building it through settlements in order to get it cheaply built, but the importance of so building it in order to give it business after the road has been built. Suppose this road is built through the South Pass. Where are the settlements from the Missouri river to California on that route, or at least until you get to Salt Lake? Is it practicable to go through Berthou's Pass? Our information is that it is the very best practicable route on which to build a road from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean. I assume it to be a fact that the road ought to be constructed by the way of Denver, and I assume that this road will ultimately go by the way of Denver. We owe it to that country to build the road there. An immense country there is now being settled up very rapidly. In the course of a very short time Colorado will be a State in the Union. Its population is rapidly increasing. The mountains of Colorado are filled with precious ores of every kind, gold and silver, &c., and the lands are said to be very fertile and of the very best quality. It is exceedingly desirable, if a good route can be obtained at all, to build it upon that line. If we go by way of Denver—and any Senator who will take up the map and examine it can decide that question for himself in a moment—the road ought to go up the Smoky Hill fork of the Kansas river. There can be no question about that. Any gentleman can satisfy himself in one moment as to the proper location of the road.

Another question to be determined is, whether, if located upon the Smoky Hill fork, the material necessary to construct the road can be obtained in equal quantities upon that route; and another consideration is, whether the surface of the country is such as to enable a road to be built as well upon that as upon the other fork of the river; that is, upon the Republican fork. Mr. President, had we not better leave that to actual survey? I do not wish to fix it on the Smoky Hill fork, because I really do not know whether there is as much timber upon it as there is upon the Republican fork. I do not wish to settle that question. It ought to be settled by survey. I understand that actual survey has settled that point: that the timber is better, as stated by the Senator from Michigan, upon that fork than it is upon the other.

If you will look at the route you will find that it is a much shorter route, provided you go by the way of Denver. If you do not intend to go by that route, you might as well put the road north. I do not object to that; but if actual survey, if the necessities of that people, if the requirements of the immense settlement around Denver City which is rapidly growing up, require that it should go by that route, it ought not to go up the Republican fork, but it ought to go up the Smoky Hill fork of the Kansas river.

But, Mr. President, where is the necessity of fixing the point absolutely in this bill unless we have further information on the subject than we have at present? What do Senators know about it? I suppose they know as much as I do, and I know as much as they do, and all of us together know nothing in regard to it. Then why not let those gentlemen who are to build this road have a scope of twenty-five or thirty miles additional in that country for their initial or starting point? Every argument that can be advanced on the subject is in favor of retaining the bill as introduced by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I have no doubt they have given it the examination that it needed in order to ascertain the proper terminus of the road.

The proposition as originally introduced by my friend from Iowa would have changed this whole thing. Instead of making the initial point on the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, he would have made the commencing point of this road on the Iowa line. That would certainly have been unjust to the other roads. Instead of commencing at a point where all the connecting roads from the East could meet upon a common ground, one or two hundred miles west of the Missouri river, and let each road strike its own branch at that point, the proposition as first introduced was to make the initial point on the Missouri river, and to make the main road absolutely go through the State of Iowa. That would certainly have been unjust to the other roads; but if it had been found to be the best route, if we were in a condition to settle that point to-day, to determine the fact that that was the best route for this great Pacific railway, that it ought to be commenced there, that the geography of the country is such as to induce its location there for the benefit of the company and for the benefit of the country, I, for one, would have made no objection whatever. But such is not the fact. We have no such information as to induce us to believe that it would be proper to commence the road there.

Mr. President, let this question be settled by actual survey. Two years ago when this subject was under consideration I offered a proposition similar to the one now contained in this bill as reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. It is true the Senate voted it down; but subsequent experience has satisfied the country, it has satisfied the enterprising gentlemen who have undertaken the construction of this road, that that is the point, and that they ought to have the benefit of the Smoky Hill fork. If it is not agreed to at this session it will be the next. The country will demand it. We shall find that it will be necessary in the end to build the road by the way of Denver. The immense settlement of people gathering there and constantly and rapidly increasing there will demand of the Government that this road pass by them. Why, sir, it is the direct and straight route from the Missouri river to California. It is the best route to Salt Lake, as I have understood. The Berthou Pass is a practicable route. It is further south, and attended with less frost and snow during the winter, and is the proper route on which to build this railroad.

But, sir, whether it be the proper one or not is not for us to determine. Let us leave it to actual survey and give a proper scope for the commencement of this great work. We are interested only in having such a point as will give to the country the very best practicable route from the Missouri river to California. We cannot get the best route by confining it within certain limits. If I had my way, as I have said before, I would extend these limits; give us broader room, give us greater area of country in which to select the point to commence this great work.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry that this question is opened up again in the Senate for discussion. I was not aware that the committee had made this change in the bill. I was called away from the city and was not present to attend all the sessions of the committee. Being a member upon it I ought to have known of this change, and probably should have known of it had I been present. We had a great deal of discussion and a great deal of difficulty two years ago in settling the route of this Pacific railroad, and Congress after spending a great deal of time upon it agreed that the road should start from some point on the one hundredth meridian of west longitude between two rivers, leaving a considerable margin between these streams, in which to select the point whence the road should start. It is now proposed to enlarge these boundaries, and instead of limiting the starting point of the road to the Republican river on the south, to extend it to the Smoky Hill branch.

I am opposed to opening that question, and I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will prevail. I have no such information that satisfies me, as the Senator from Missouri communicates to the Senate. He says it will be better to take this road further south. It may be so. Congress did not think so two years ago. He made then the same proposition that he is pressing to-day. The Senate voted it down then, and I am sorry that we have opened up the question. I trust that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa will prevail and that we will stand by the bill as Congress originally passed it in this respect. The object of this bill is to remedy certain defects in the old law and enable the parties who are taking hold of this measure to construct the road. That is what Congress desires; it is what the nation desires; and I do not think it was intended to open up this controversy again as to the location of the road. I hope the Senate will stand by the bill in this respect as we had it before.

Mr. HOWARD. As I remarked before, I feel no anxiety on this subject one way or the other. I felt it a duty to state to the Senate the reasons which influenced the minds of many gentlemen connected with this enterprise for allowing an extension of this mutable point, so to speak, as the initial point of the road. I have done so. Having done that, I have nothing further to say, except in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Illinois, that this is as much an open question before this body as any other point connected with this Pacific railroad; and if he did not want this question opened his duty was to have attended the sessions of the committee, with a view there to express his opinions and have them embodied in the form of a bill. I do not feel that he has any peculiar privilege of calling me, as the chairman of that committee, to task for inserting this thing, that thing, or the other in the bill, so long as I have acted in good faith and under the advice of so many of the members of the committee as I was able to get together. I do not regard it as a very gracious mode of treating the bill or the committee. I have nothing further to say upon this subject.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why, Mr. President, I made no attack on the chairman of the committee. I said I was called away and was not present at the different meetings of the committee, and did not know of this change. I made no attack upon the chairman of the committee or the committee at all. I excused myself for not knowing of the change because I was necessarily absent from the city, and was not present at the meetings of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator resorted to rather a censorious tone against the committee for introducing a subject-matter into the bill which they saw fit to introduce, and it was that censorious tone to which I desired to reply.

Mr. MORRILL. When the bill to which this is an amendment was before the Senate two years ago I gave the subject some consideration with a view of obtaining some definite idea of the general character of this enterprise, and I have, I think, a pretty distinct recollection of this particular question, and I think it was very carefully considered at the time with reference to two or three points. The question was to find a point of departure on the one hundredth meridian. How should that be determined? It seemed to be settled that we should take our departure on that meridian. What shall determine it? It was very evident there were a great many private wishes on the subject. Looking for facts which would determine the point of departure, it was said that to this one hundredth meridian the railroads of the States east of it would seem to conspire, and I think that that fact contributed somewhat in fixing that as the point of departure. But beyond that it was stated that the general features of the country determined this to be the proper point of departure; and it was stated that these features of the country indicated that on that meridian, within one hundred miles between two points, one point on the north and another on the south, you might find a place where it was perfectly practicable to commence the point of departure. Above that and below that it was said not to be so well defined; that the natural features of the country were not so accessible, were believed to offer obstacles, and that if you went above or below you would find difficulties in the natural configuration of the country.

I remember very distinctly that these were the considerations which influenced my mind, and which I think were stated then to be the controlling considerations in fixing this line of departure on the one hundredth meridian and between the two points indicated in the original bill. If that was so, they were certainly substantial reasons, and they ought to obtain now. I have heard no new facts stated which contravene those general propositions. For that reason, according with the original convictions I had, which were then quite definite, I shall be inclined to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Iowa to amend this bill so as to confine it to the original point of departure.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish only to add this additional observation: if the amendment I have suggested should prevail it will not prevent the company from building the road to Denver. The route up the Republican fork is known to be quite as good as that up the Smoky Hill fork.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. In the twenty-fifth line of the first section, after the word "river," I move to strike out the words "in the Territory of Nebraska." As the clause has just been amended, it reads:

From a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Republican fork of the Kansas river and the north margin of the valley of the Platte river, in the Territory of Nebraska, to the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada.

I understand that a part of the valley of the Platte river lies in the State of Kansas, and I desire to have the whole of that valley within which to fix the starting point, if necessary.

Mr. POMEROY. It is a part of the valley of the Republican that may be in the State of Kansas. I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator to strike out those words, "in the Territory of Nebraska," because as the clause now stands it obliges the point to be in Nebraska even though the river does not run there.

Mr. HOWARD. That is the difficulty.

Mr. POMEROY. We cannot by any law of Congress make the river in Nebraska if it does not lie there. It is very near the line; but as the country has never been surveyed, and as the river has never been surveyed, we do not know certainly which side of the line it is on; so that if we strike out that phrase we shall have to commence on the river.

Mr. HARLAN. Personally I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan; but it raises the question whether Congress has the right to organize a corporation to build a railroad through a State without the consent of the State. That is the only question.

Mr. POMEROY. There will be no difficulty practically. The State of Kansas will give the right if there is any trouble about that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope these words will not be stricken out for the reason that I suggested before. I am for leaving the starting point of the road as we left it in the old bill. I do not think there is any demand for changing it. This is the language of the old law. It is the way the law is now.

Mr. POMEROY. Let me remind the Senator that when the old bill was under discussion a map was produced in which it was thought that the Republican was all in the Territory of Nebraska. It has since been ascertained that the south margin of the Republican will probably fall a little within the State of Kansas, and we cannot make the point in the bill if we say that it shall be in Nebraska, because the river, it is thought, does not all lie in Nebraska.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Kansas will observe that it is the "north margin of the valley of the Platte river, in the Territory of Nebraska," that is here spoken of.

Mr. POMEROY. That phrase, "in the Territory of Nebraska," applies to the point, not to the river. I admit that the Platte river is in Nebraska; there is no question about that; but that phrase, "in the Territory of Nebraska," refers to the point of connection.

Mr. HOWARD. The starting point must be in Nebraska according to the law as it now stands, and according to this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; I do not so understand it. Let me read to the Senate the way it will stand as amended, and as the old law is. The clause now reads:

From a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Republican fork of the Kansas river, and the north margin of the valley of the Platte river in the Territory of Nebraska.

Somewhere between those two points the road is to start. It is not necessarily to start in the Territory of Nebraska, but it is to start between the north margin of the valley of the Platte river, which reaches into Nebraska—everybody knows that—and the south margin of the valley of the Republican river. I think it should remain. That is the old law, I believe.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken as to the meaning of the phrase, if he will allow me to say a word. The words "in the Territory of Nebraska" are to have some meaning. They were inserted in the connection in which they stand in the law for the purpose, undoubtedly, of avoiding the difficulty which has been alluded to by the Senator from Kansas; that is, the impossibility of Congress taking land lying within a State and applying it to make a railroad. The object of Congress in this enactment in 1862 was to commence the work of this railroad within the Territory of Nebraska and not in the State of Kansas. That was the purpose of inserting the words: "There can be no doubt about that, and I think the Senator from Illinois on reviewing the language will see his mistake." He has misapprehended the meaning and intent of the expression.

As to the right of the Government to take land for the purpose of constructing a railroad, I hold, and I think there can be no dissent from that principle, that the United States has the same power of eminent domain over the lands lying within a State for the purpose of constructing a railroad in order to carry out the objects of a corporation as is possessed by the State, and I have in my mind not the slightest difficulty as to the power of the Government to seize and to condemn the lands of private persons lying within a State for such a purpose. We have plenary power for that purpose, if we have power to erect a corporation for such a purpose; and I think no one will deny the power of Congress to erect a corporation for such a purpose.

Mr. POMEROY. These lands are all public lands of the United States, both in Kansas and in Nebraska. There are no settlers there. But the Senator from Illinois will bear in mind that this phrase "in the Territory of Nebraska" has the same meaning as though it occurred after the word "point" in the twenty-first line so as to read, "from a point in the Territory of Nebraska on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich," &c.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Between these lines.

Mr. POMEROY. But the idea that this bill intends to convey is not to confine it necessarily to Nebraska, but to confine it to those two rivers. If those rivers do not both happen to be in Nebraska—and nobody knows at present anything about it; there has been no accurate survey—we want the privilege of making connection on the Republican, even though it falls within the State of Kansas; and by striking out the words "in the Territory of Nebraska" we accomplish that object.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No doubt that object will be accomplished if these words are stricken out, and the road may then be commenced in the State of Kansas; but Congress thought proper two years ago to fix the boundaries within which this road should be commenced between these two valleys, the south margin of the valley of the Republican river and the north margin of the valley of the Platte river. I am not for extending it.

Mr. POMEROY. This does not extend it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does extend it if it shall be found that any portion of the valley of the Republican river lies in the State of Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. But you gave us the whole of that valley.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We gave you that whole valley provided the whole of it lay in the Territory of Nebraska, otherwise we did not; and now you propose to unsettle that matter. It is the same question over again. It involves this other question that I think need not be brought up now, as to whether the Government of the United States has authority to charter a company to construct railroads in the States. That is a question that I do not think we need go into. There is no necessity for raising it now on this point. There will be no difficulty in finding sufficient ground upon which to build this road. There is margin enough as the law stands. I am for abiding by the law of 1862 in that respect. I hope the amendment will not be made.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to inquire whether the law of 1862 says the "Republican river or Kansas river" or the "Republican fork of the Kansas river?"

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will read what the law of 1862 says:

"From a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Republican river and the north margin of the valley of the Platte river."

The bill before us has already been amended to conform exactly to the law of 1862. The motion now pending is to strike out the words "in the Territory of Nebraska," so as to extend the limits within which to start this route, if the amendment prevails. If it does not prevail we shall stand by the law of 1862, about which we had so much discussion when it passed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to have the Secretary report the clause as it now stands as amended. I want to hear the language as it is now.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And said company is hereby authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, finish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph, with the appurtenances thereto, from a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Republican fork of the Kansas river and the north margin of the valley of the Platte river, in the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. HENDERSON. My friend from Illinois certainly maintains this proposition by the most remarkable argument. He says that he wants to stick by the bill of the last Congress, no matter whether it has any sense in it or not, as I understand the argument. Every inch of the Republican fork of the Kansas river may be in Kansas, and yet he will stick to the bill of the last Congress, whether there can be any initial point upon the Republican fork or not! I am very fond of that which is consecrated by the past; I am very fond of precedent; I am very fond of sticking to the letter of the law; but if the letter of the law turns out to be improper I have no such prejudice as will prevent me from amending it.

Now it is stated here that at the last Congress we supposed the Republican fork of the Kansas river was entirely in the Territory of Nebraska. Any gentleman can take a recently published map and ascertain for himself that the southern margin of the Republican fork of the Kansas river on the one hundredth meridian of west longitude is in Kansas. Why then shall we stick to the law of last Congress, provided the meaning is such as is intimated by the Senator from Illinois, whether we can get an initial point on it or not? Suppose the north margin of the Republican fork turned out to be in Kansas, how would the law be executed? Suppose they wanted to commence on the Republican fork; that would prevent them commencing on the Republican fork at all.

I am free to confess that my construction of this law is as the Senator from Illinois originally stated to be his construction; that is, that the words "in the Territory of Nebraska" were simply descriptive of the Platte river, and not of the point of beginning; but certainly some doubt has arisen in the true construction of the law as to whether it defined the initial point of beginning or whether it was descriptive of the Platte river. If descriptive of the Platte river the phrase need not be in. Was that the intention of the framers of the law originally? If that is the case there is no harm in this remaining, provided such may be made the construction.

But suppose the river be found to be in the State of Kansas as now intimated, and suppose the proper construction of the law turns out to be that the words "in the Territory of Nebraska" are descriptive of the initial point, then we cannot get an initial point there at all. I ask the Senator from Illinois if it ought not to be amended so that the initial point may be had. If the bill is liable to such a construction why not amend it? Why cling to the language of the original bill? The way it is at present amended is not the language of the original bill; but I do not object to it. The language of the original bill was the "Republican river." It is now the "Republican fork of the Kansas river." The Senator makes no objection—

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator is mistaken. There is no mention of any "fork" in the bill as it is amended.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was so read by the Secretary just now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not understand him to read it so. I will ask that it be reported again. The Secretary read, as follows:

And said company is hereby authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, finish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph, with the appurtenances thereto, from a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Republican fork of the Kansas river and the north margin of the Platte river.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is right, because the name of the branch of the Kansas river is the Republican fork.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not object to it because it changes and makes proper the description of that which was uncertain before; but I believe there is a river in that section of the country called the Republican river.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This is sometimes called the Republican river, and sometimes the Republican fork.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not object to it; but it is a change from the law of the last Congress. The description here, perhaps, is proper; but why does the Senator from Illinois object to making that clear and plain which is now in doubt? Four or five Senators have spoken, and they all differ about the construction of the law of the last session. Then why not make it plain? Why should we be so tenacious about the words that were adopted by the Senate two years ago, as to lose sight of the main principle of the measure? I think the Senator, on reconsideration, will let these words be stricken out.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The language of this bill is very peculiar, and so was that of the original bill in defining the points between which this railroad was to begin. They used these most extraordinary words, "the south margin of the valley of the river," not the south margin of the river. I should like to know where the east margin of the valley of the Mississippi is? It is the Alleghany mountains; and the west margin of the valley of the Mississippi would be the Rocky mountains. This language, "the south margin of the valley," is the most indefinite and undefinable language that could be used in describing the valleys of the great rivers of this country. It takes a sweep of hundreds and thousands of miles. The reason why these words, "in the Territory of Nebraska," were inserted was to give definiteness to that which was otherwise exceedingly indefinite.

Now, if you look upon the map the river itself on the one hundredth meridian is in the Territory of Nebraska. It is not in the State of Kansas, nor within forty miles of the State of Kansas. I repeat that the Republican fork of the river on the one hundredth meridian is in the Territory of Nebraska, forty miles and more from the State of Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. It is not five miles from the line. The only question is whether it is five miles or not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The south margin of the valley would extend into Kansas. It would extend as a matter of course to the highlands which separate the waters that flow into the Republican fork from the waters that flow into the Solomon fork, which is the next one south.

Mr. POMEROY. I was not talking about the valley, but about the river itself, which is very near there.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The base line of the survey by the maps shows that the Republican fork runs away up into the Territory of Nebraska. It is true, when you go two or three degrees of longitude further west there is a little lake in Kansas which seems to be the head of this Republican river; but this river takes a direction running northwest across up into Nebraska, and then down again into Kansas. That is the way it evidently is on the map. There is a lake in Kansas, and then from that the river runs up into the Territory of Nebraska. The words "in the Territory of Nebraska" were inserted in this clause on purpose to say that the south line should be the limit south to which they might go in fixing this starting point on the hundredth meridian of longitude, and to avoid the other question, which was very much discussed heretofore, whether it was within the constitutional power of Congress to create a corporation to build a railroad within a State. We avoided both questions by inserting these words, "in the Territory of Nebraska," which fixes the south line to which it could go.

Now, I will say, in relation to this matter, and I think we have some right to speak upon it, representing, as we do, the western States, though none of the States west of Michigan happened to be represented on the committee; we had no voice in this business—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Iowa is represented.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. None of the northern range of States is represented. We thought that as we had interests in this matter, as we had a great many railroads that were pointing in this direction, we had about as good a right to be represented on the committee and have something to say on the subject as the States that lie just on the central line—Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, and Iowa. We think now that the committee ought to be satisfied at least to leave this matter of the starting point of the railroad where it was fixed two years ago. We are satisfied to let that stand; and if there is an attempt to change the starting point, I confess, for one, I am not entirely satisfied. This bill undertakes to change the starting point by running down to what is called the south margin of the Smoky Hill fork of the Kansas river, which is down next to the Arkansas river, for the Arkansas river is the next river which lies south of the Smoky Hill fork; and when you come to the south margin of the valley of the Smoky Hill fork you get just to the dividing line between the Smoky Hill fork and the Arkansas. It changes the starting point more than one hundred miles.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Oh, no.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly it does by the map. I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate. I simply say to the committee that I hope they will leave the starting point to stand where it was fixed when the matter was discussed before.

Mr. HENDERSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to make one statement before the vote is taken, and I will not detain the Senate. Senators will see by examining Johnson's map recently published that the south margin of the valley of the Republican fork of the Kansas river is some twenty-five or thirty miles in Kansas; that the main road that runs from Atchison, in Kansas Territory, to Denver, in the valley of that river, is some twenty-five miles inside of the State of Kansas at the point of the one hundredth meridian. If these words be retained it will make it almost utterly impossible for the company to obtain an eligible position if they go on the south bank of the Republican fork. That certainly was not the intention of the original bill. It was a mistake at the time, and these words ought to be stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS. I am requested by my colleague [Mr. POWELL] to state that he is necessarily absent at the Departments.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Harding, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Richardson, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, and Willey—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Grimes, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Wilson, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. I have another amendment that I wish to present. Before doing so, however, I desire to remark that, as far as I understand it, the phraseology of this bill was never fixed by a vote of the committee. I say this that I may be understood by the Senate and more particularly by the chairman of the committee. The committee, at a meeting at which I was present, decided on the principles that should control in drawing up the bill, and having great confidence, as every member of the committee had, in the ability of the chairman of the committee, they directed him to draw up the bill on those principles; so that if we discover or suppose we discover some defect or want of congruity in the language, I trust it will not be construed as opposing a decision of the committee, for, as I before remarked, at no meeting when I was present was the phraseology of the bill ever decided on by a vote of the committee. I move, on page 5, line one hundred and three of section one, after the word "shall," to insert:

On which the assessments provided for in this act, not less than ten per cent. of the par value, have been actually paid in money.

The purpose that controls me in offering this amendment is this: on the following page, the 6th page, there is this provision:

And every person now a subscriber to said capital stock, for each share of $1,000 heretofore subscribed and on which there has been paid not less than ten per cent., shall be entitled to a certificate for ten shares of $100 each on the surrender of his original certificate.

So that no person now a member of the corporation, who holds stock on which he may have paid less than ten per cent., can vote on a share. The phraseology as it now stands unamended on the 5th page, would entitle a new subscriber to vote before he had paid anything on the new stock thus subscribed. That would enable individuals now coming into the organization to take control of the organization without paying in any money, taking it out of the hands of those who originally organized the company under the law as it now stands. This, of course, was not the intention of the committee, or of the chairman of the committee. If this amendment shall prevail it will place the holders of the new stock hereafter to be subscribed in the same situation precisely with the holders of the old stock.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will turn to the 3d page he will see that no new subscriptions can be made until ten per cent. is paid in. In the forty-seventh and forty-eighth lines, after speaking about books being opened in these various cities to receive new subscriptions, it is said that before the subscriptions are taken the subscriber "shall pay to the treasurer of the company an amount per share subscribed by him equal to the amount per share previously paid by the then existing stockholders." That is precisely the same provision, but I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to the amendment. It does not change the meaning at all.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following amendment: on page 6, line one hundred and twenty-three, section one, after the word "paid" insert "or may hereafter be paid according to the provisions of this act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend on the 8th page by inserting in line one hundred and sixty-eight of section one, after the word "paid" these words, "as such directors each." The text is, "they shall, while absent from home attending to their duties, be paid their actual traveling expenses and compensation at the rate of eight dollars per day, for the time thus actually employed." I suppose the object is to pay each of these Government directors eight dollars a day, but the phraseology as it now stands I think might be construed to limit them to the amount of eight dollars for the services of both persons.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. On page 11, commencing in line forty-four of section three, I move that the following words be stricken out:

And shall also deduct from the damages to be awarded to the applicant for the same any increase in the value due to the construction of the road, of the premises retained by him, provided such premises formed a portion of those taken.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. That provision is nothing but a reenactment of a clause which is found in almost every railroad charter in modern times.

Mr. HARLAN. The clause as it now stands provides—

And said commissioners, in their assessments of damages, shall appraise such premises at what would have been the value thereof if the road had not been built.

That I propose to leave in the bill, so that the railroad company will not be compelled to pay the holder of real estate the enhanced value of the property growing out of the work that they themselves do; but it seems to me to be a great hardship to deduct from the original value of what is left in the hands of the holder the supposed enhanced value of what the railroad arbitrarily takes from the owner. It may be that if a man owns ten acres of land on the line of this road, and the railroad company chooses to take five of those acres, thereby the remaining five acres may be enhanced in value double the original amount; and if they take the five acres, paying nothing therefor, the original holder will be as rich a man as he was before. That would be true if he desired to sell his land; but if he desired to cultivate the remaining five acres for the purpose of supporting his wife and children, they would not produce any more bushels of potatoes, wheat, or corn than they would before the railroad was built; so that if he retained his property he would receive no additional advantage from the construction of the road growing out of the enhanced value of the property which he would not desire to sell.

It seems to me that with these words stricken out these companies will have secured all they have a right to claim, to pay for the property they take at the value of that property assessed at a standard which existed preceding the construction of the road. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know but that the railroad charters in the State of Michigan and some other States may contain a provision like that here proposed to be stricken out; but I am quite sure that the provision contained in this bill is against the railroad charters in the State of Wisconsin and the State of New York, and against the decisions of the courts in the estimation of the damages to which parties are entitled. I do not understand that in estimating the damages done to the private property of an individual by taking a portion of it for railroad purposes the railroad company is authorized to offset against the damages that general enhancement of the value of property which arises from the construction of a railroad in that section or region of the country. That has never been held with us; but it has always been held that if there were any direct advantages created to the land by the building of the railroad, as, for instance, the draining of the land by the construction of the railroad ditches, the land being enhanced in value in that way, the enhancement could be offset as against the damages resulting from the value of the land taken. Never have the courts gone to the length of saying, nor have any acts of legislation gone to the extent of saying, that the enhancement of the value growing out of the creation of such an improvement in that section, neighborhood, or town, by the building of a railroad or a canal, should be taken from the damages to which an individual is entitled for land actually taken from him.

This question has arisen a hundred times; when I have been acting as judge in the State of Wisconsin it has been before me. My own opinion, of course, on the subject I do not claim any particular consideration for; but it has been in the higher courts of our State acted upon frequently. This question of the appraisal of railroad dangers I understand to be very clearly settled and very well defined by the decisions of the courts; and if this clause were left out of the bill the general law and the decisions of the courts in reference to such damages would be the rule that would prevail. Take the case which has been put; suppose that a man has ten acres of ground located, if this railroad is not constructed, perhaps a hundred miles from a railroad; it may not be worth over twenty dollars an acre; build a railroad by it, and take half of it, and the building of the railroad probably would make the rest of the land worth fifty dollars an acre. So the general rise and enhancement in the value of the land by the building of the railroad would be more than the whole of the damages that this individual would suffer from the taking of his land. But here are large numbers of persons whose lands are not taken, whose lands are in the immediate neighborhood, and whose lands are doubled and quadrupled in their value by the building of the railroad, and the railroad does not damage them; it does them just as much good, and inflicts no damage; and yet to the man whom you damage you say, "While we damage you by taking away one half of your land, you shall have nothing, because the remainder of the land has been doubled in value because of the building of the railroad in that section of the country."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if he calls that damaging a man to make the balance of his land worth four times what it was worth before.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One man has just as good a right to the general improvement of the country produced by the building of a canal or a railroad, and the general enhancement of property which he happens to own, as another, and it is an injustice to a particular individual if you take half his land and do not touch the land of the man adjoining him; you put thousands of dollars into the pockets of one man and you take the other man's land from him. There is an injustice in that; and I tell my friend from Illinois that the courts do not sustain any such doctrine. It has been decided in a hundred cases. The effect of this provision is that a man whose land is taken cannot enjoy the general benefit which arises from the construction of the road. My friend from Illinois had better examine the cases bearing on this question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I confess I cannot appreciate how the man is damaged who is better off than he was before he received the damage; but the Senator from Wisconsin thinks the injustice consists in this; some man owns a tract of land just off the railroad, that is not touched, and that is quadrupled in value, and he makes a fortune; and then the man whose land is touched is damaged wonderfully because somebody else has made a fortune, because the other man whose land was not taken is going to make more than he whose land was taken; therefore he is greatly wronged; it hurts his feelings because his neighbor makes more money than he! I do not know what they have decided in the State of Wisconsin, but it is the commonest thing in the world in my State. When we lay out streets in the cities and take a portion of somebody's lots of land, the jury that assess the damages always take into consideration the benefits that the party is to derive from the opening of those streets and ways through his land. That is the practice in my State, and the courts sustain that practice. I think if my worthy friend from Wisconsin will look into the law-books he will find a great many decisions sustaining that doctrine.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will my friend allow me to state that the Constitution of the United States says that you shall not take from a man his property without giving him compensation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very true.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. You must pay him for the property that you have taken. You do not pay him for that property by saying generally, "We built a railroad somewhere in the country by means of which indirectly we have doubled the value of the property." That does not pay him a dollar, does not pay him a cent. Your provision is unconstitutional, and the courts will so hold it, if you go beyond the direct benefits which you confer by the drainage upon the land, by the direct act of the company in cutting its ditches through the land. You may drain a piece of land that is a swamp, you may drain a piece of meadow, if you please, and the direct benefit that the land may receive from the putting of your ditches through the land may be taken into the account, but you can go no further.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I quite agree that you shall not take a person's property without paying him for it, and we propose to do that; we propose to have a jury sworn and to assess and ascertain whether he is not paid for it; and if he really gets more by reason of what you do to his land than he had before, I think he is paid for it. That is the very question the jury is to be impaneled to try. He may be made rich by the building of your road, and the jury is sworn to ascertain that very question. We do not propose to take his land without paying him for it. If he is damaged in the least he is to be paid for it; but when he is not damaged the bill proposes not to pay him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to put a case to the Senator from Illinois, if he will allow me. Suppose a man has a piece of land consisting of five acres by itself, and he has unconnected with it a piece of land consisting of fifty acres; you build a railroad and in building it you take the whole of the five acre piece; the fifty acre lot, which does not adjoin with it, has no connection with it, by means of the building of a railroad in that section of country perhaps is doubled in value; do you give him anything for the five acres?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The difficulty with the Senator's proposition is that that is not the bill. The bill provides, "and shall also deduct from the damages to be awarded to the applicant for the same any increase in the value, due to the construction of the road, of the premises retained by him, provided such premises formed a portion of those taken." All the difficulty with the case put by the Senator from Wisconsin is that it does not happen to be the provision of the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Is there any difference in principle whether the five acres happen to join another five acres which he owns or whether there is a ten acre lot between? There is no difference in the principle; and it is because the gentleman stands on a foundation of sand that he is getting into this difficulty. I wish he would examine the cases on the question.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not intend to interfere in this discussion; but I am persuaded that this provision is unconstitutional, and I will state in a word the reason why. The railroad company can only acquire the title to land for the purposes of the company by paying for it. This provision does not provide for such payment. What is it? It simply declares that these commissioners shall award to the owner of the land what it would have been worth if the railroad had not been made, not its value. It is not proposed to pay its value as it is when it is taken, as the owner has a right to have, but what the land would have been worth if a certain contingency had not happened. That is not complying with the provision of the Constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Those are not the words proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The motion is to strike out the latter part of the clause.

Mr. HARRIS. The clause reads that in the assessments of damages the commissioners shall appraise the land "at what would have been the value thereof if the road had not been built."

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no motion to strike out those words.

Mr. HARRIS. I am stating what this provision is, and I insist that this is an unconstitutional provision. It will not give to the railroad company title to the land. If the commissioners assess the damages according to the provisions of this bill as it stands, the company will not acquire a valid title. But there is this further provision which it is sought to strike out, and which is equally objectionable, that after the commissioners assess the value of the land taken they shall deduct from that the amount of the advantage which they shall deem that the owner of the land has acquired in respect to other land not taken. Such a set-off was never yet allowed, I apprehend, by any intelligent court. It cannot be done. In order to acquire a valid title, under the Constitution, the railroad company must give to the owner of the land its present value, as it is estimated by commissioners or a jury. I admit that in assessing those damages where there is no such provision as this, a jury or commissioners will be very apt to estimate and measure the amount of the value by taking into consideration the collateral advantages which the owner will receive; but that is a matter for the commissioners or the jury, a question of fact in the valuation, and not a constitutional question.

Mr. HOWARD. It is rather late in the day, sir, to discuss so dry a question of constitutional law, and I am not disposed to enter upon it at this time; but I shall feel very much obliged to the honorable Senator from New York if he will state to the Senate upon what principle of the Constitution it is that he rests the assertion that either one or both of these clauses is obnoxious to constitutional objection. Which clause is it that violates the Constitution of the United States, and what is the clause of the Constitution that is violated? I do not understand, I confess. I suppose the honorable Senator refers to that clause of the Constitution which declares that private property shall not be taken without just compensation; if I misunderstand the Senator I should like to have him correct me.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly, that is it.

Mr. HOWARD. "Without just compensation." The only question between the Government of the United States and the private person when the property of the private person is taken, is what is a just compensation to be made by the Government to the private person who was the owner of the property. "Just compensation." I do not understand that the Constitution requires such a question to be settled by a jury ad quod damnum at all, but that it is quite sufficient if the Government in the exercise of its powers shall appoint an impartial commission to determine what shall be, under the circumstances, a just compensation; and certainly a just compensation will be such as shall place the owner of the land in such a condition as that he shall not upon the principles of equity be a loser by the taking of his property. Will the honorable Senator from New York say that the effect of this clause will be to do such an act of injustice to the private owner of property? Does it not propose to give him a just compensation? Certainly it proposes to give him what his lands would have been worth if the company had not constructed the road in the first place. That we must give him. We propose to pay him that, that is to allow it to him, in every event. Suppose, then, his property which we take was worth $1,000; and suppose at the same time that while we take this property that is worth $1,000 we do by the construction of the road increase his adjoining property, property belonging to the same parcel, to the amount of $4,000 actually: are we bound under the Constitution to allow to the owner actually his $4,000 worth of enhanced value? It seems to me that that is not a just compensation. It is surely unjust toward the Government, because it is the act of the Government in the construction of the road that imparts the enhanced value to the remaining part of the property; so that all that remains to be done by the Government in such a case, it seems to me, is to strike an account between the Government and the private person, to charge him with the benefit which the construction of the work is likely to confer upon him, and to credit the Government with the enhanced value of the remainder of his property. It seems to me to be a very simple principle. I cannot see that there is anything here in violation of the Constitution. On the other hand, I think I do see a very plain rule by which common justice is administered.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I had not heard the Senator from New York so confidently express an opinion as to the unconstitutionality of this provision, I should have supposed it was free of all doubt upon that point. The provisions in all the railroad charters which Maryland has granted, and as far as I know of all the charters that have been granted in the States this side of New England, contain a provision similar to this.

The constitutional limitation on the power of Congress that private property shall not be taken for public use except for just compensation, is the same limitation which is to be found in all the State constitutions, and would be a limitation if there was no provision upon the subject in either constitution. But the construction of that clause has been that no man's property shall be taken without placing him in the same situation peculiarly in which he would have been if his property had not been taken; and we have always supposed in Maryland that if you take one acre of a man's land for the purpose of an improvement of this description, and the effect of the improvement is to add to the value of his own land more than the original value of the acre taken, he is entitled to nothing; and in the absence of provisions on the subject, which I understand is the case in some of the New England States, the jury or the commissioners who are to decide upon the question do the same thing. If the acre that is taken was worth $1,000 at the time, they will not give the owner $1,000 if they are satisfied that his adjoining acres are increased by force of the improvement more than the thousand dollars. We have gone further in our city, though we have not gone to that extent in the country. The streets in the city of Baltimore are opened under the authority of acts of the Legislature, and we have directed, without any doubt at all as to the constitutionality of it, that the expense of the improvement shall be defrayed by all the property that the commissioners who are authorized to act shall decide is benefited by the improvement, and the owners are taxed the amount of the benefit. That happens every day in all the recent improvements in the city of Baltimore; I mean by "recent," improvements for the last twenty or thirty years, in the opening of streets and widening of streets, they have been made under provisions of that description.

Mr. HOWE. How is it as to property taken by a private corporation?

Mr. JOHNSON. The original difficulty as to the authority for a private corporation was whether that was appropriating the property to public use; in other words, whether the Government had a right to authorize a private corporation to take private property; but that has been decided over and over again. It has over and over been held that that is a proper exercise of the right of eminent domain, and all that the courts have held is that these private corporations are authorized to do precisely as the Government is authorized or is supposed to be authorized to do, to see justice done as between the corporation and the individual whose property is taken.

My own opinion, therefore, is that the provision itself, whether politic or not, is clearly constitutional.

Mr. HARRIS. I agree with the Senator from Maryland that in the case of opening streets the rule is as he states it. There the property is taken for public use; it is for a public purpose; and the owners of adjacent property are assessed for the purpose of paying for that improvement, so that if a part of a lot is taken for opening a street and the remaining part is benefited by it, the authorities award to the owner of the lot the value of that part of it which is taken, and then assess back upon him the amount of benefit that he derives from the property not taken.

That is a very different question from this. This is where property is being taken for private use. It is being taken by a railroad corporation from the owner for private use. I understand the rule to be well settled that full compensation must be made under the provisions of the Constitution or else no title passes. It must be compensation for the property as it is at the time it is taken, not as it would have been if the improvement had not been made. That is the difficulty with this bill, in my judgment. The commissioners who stand in the place of a jury are required to assess the value of the property upon a mere abstraction. They are to guess what the property would have been worth in a state of things which does not now exist. It is not making compensation for the property as it is, but it is making compensation for the property as it would have been if the improvement had not been made, an improvement which is already in existence, which is contemplated at least. Here is a rule prescribed for the commissioners which is not in conformity with the Constitution. That is the difficulty in the case. In my judgment that provision cannot be upheld.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think the questions involved in this argument are plain and have been settled by the courts in a hundred decisions in different States. I understand that private property may be taken for public use under the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and that private property may be taken by authority of law, to be appropriated by a corporation such as is proposed to be incorporated by this act. But, sir, to authorize private property to be taken for public use, the law itself must declare that it shall be so taken; and unless the law in its provisions declares that private property shall be taken for the use contemplated by the act of incorporation, it cannot be taken at all; and the courts have so decided again and again. If gentlemen expect to take private property without an express authority in this act, to be appropriated to this road, and it is resisted by the owner, they will find that the resistance will be successful in any intelligent and impartial court. The only mode by which they can effect that object is for the act of incorporation itself to provide, as the express law of the Congress of the United States, that this property shall be taken for that purpose; and unless the act of incorporation contains such a provision it will be ineffective to subserve all the purposes that gentlemen who are friends to this project contemplate.

When private property is thus provided by the law of a State, or by a law of Congress constitutionally passed, to be taken and to be used either wholly and exclusively by the Government or by an incorporated company acting by authority of law, the question then is, what shall be the rule of compensation? That has been settled hundreds of times, and upon this plain principle, that the value of the property taken at the time it is taken shall be paid. You may assess that value by a jury or you may assess it by commissioners, but you must prescribe the mode in the act itself by which it shall be assessed, whether by a jury or by a commission; and the courts of the States have decided again and again that either mode is constitutional and valid; but it is an inquiry in the nature of a judicial proceeding whether it is in the one form or the other.

Now, in relation to incidental advantages resulting to contiguous property by a proposed improvement, it is decided uniformly and always that that shall not diminish the assessment of the value of the property that is actually taken from the owner. The actual value of that property at the time it is so taken, without any consideration of the enhanced value of contiguous property, is to be assessed and is to be paid to the owner before you can deprive him of his property. You have to pay the full value of the property, but you are not bound to pay a prospective, increased value that will result as one of the indirect consequences of the construction of the improvement. You take the property without regard to the improvement and the effects that the improvement will have on contiguous property belonging to any neighbor; and you just assess the value of that property at the time you take it, without any regard to the effects that the construction of the improvement will have in the enhancement of the property. I think that the principles decided are perfectly plain.

It is not analogous to the taking of property for public improvements in cities and in towns. There the corporation may compel the owners of property to improve, and they exercise that as a police power of their town or city corporations. But there is no analogous power that can be claimed in relation to this or any other act of incorporation for a railroad company. You here simply propose to take a man's private property for public use. You may by a jury or by a commission, after the law as proposed has invested the company with power to take the private property, go upon the premises, and ascertain and assess the value of the land so taken, without any regard to the enhanced value of contiguous property by the construction of the work of internal improvement, and you simply pay for the original value of the property as thus ascertained.

I think that this section of the clause secures everything that the company would be bound to pay to the owner of the property and everything that the owner of the property would be entitled to claim, namely:

And said commissioners, in their assessments of damages, shall appraise such premises at what would have been the value thereof if the road had not been built.

I think that is an ample provision, both to protect the interests of the company and to remunerate the owner of the property for what portion of his property is taken from him. The other words I think are wrong and ought to be struck out, which go on to say:

And shall also deduct from the damages to be awarded to the applicant for the same any increase in the value due to the construction of the road of the premises retained by him, provided such premises formed a portion of those taken.

That endeavors to establish a principle that has uniformly been determined against by the courts. Their uniform decision has been that the incidental enhancement of contiguous property by a work of internal improvement shall not diminish in any degree or to any extent the value of the property that is actually taken for the work. Property that is actually taken is to be paid for by the corporation or by the Government, if the Government takes it for its own purposes, at the price which it would be worth regardless of the construction of the work of internal improvement.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can be received at this time only by unanimous consent.

Mr. POMEROY. We can finish this bill tomorrow if we sit.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope we shall proceed to finish the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we had better finish the bill first.

Mr. GRIMES. I will not insist on the motion now.

Mr. HENDERSON. We are discussing a question and making no progress. Is it in order now to move an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] will give me his ear, I think we can arrange this section so as to accomplish what he desires, and in such a way that there will be no objection on the part of the committee. With that view I suggest an amendment which will make the clause read thus:

And said commissioners in their assessments of damages shall appraise the premises so taken at the reasonable value thereof, and shall also deduct from the damages to be awarded to the applicant for the same any increase in the value, arising from the construction of the road, to the whole tract remaining, over and above the general increase in the value of other lands in the vicinity.

I think that will accomplish all that is desired, and it is in accordance, I am satisfied, with the decisions of the courts throughout the United States on this subject of damages.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri meets the point I had in my mind, and I therefore accept it as a modification of my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in the power of the Senator from Iowa to modify his amendment, the yeas and nays having been ordered on it. It can be modified only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the modification cannot be made. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have taken occasion since I was last up to look for a moment at some of the cases on this subject to refresh my recollection, and I find an almost unbroken series of decisions. It is true that in some of the States under special statutes, as, for instance, in the State of Illinois, where I apprehend the Senator from Illinois got his education on this subject, under a special statute somewhat similar in its provisions to this, the courts of Illinois did once hold to the doctrine for which he contends here; but the courts in Massachusetts, in New York, in Ohio, in Iowa, in Wisconsin, and in most of the States have held the contrary doctrine. I, of course, have not had an opportunity to look through them to a sufficient extent to state them all. So manifestly unjust is the provision contained in this bill to appraise a man's lands as wild lands without any railroad near them, then take a portion of his lands from him, and appraise that portion as land having a railroad constructed in its neighborhood, and deduct from what you appraise as wild lands the enhanced value of the improved land, indirectly improved by the building of the railroad, that in the State of New York, by statute, it is expressly forbidden that the courts shall take any such thing into consideration; and in the State of Ohio it is put into the constitution of the State that in estimating the compensation which is to be made for a man's property taken the court and the jury shall not consider the enhanced value of the lands which are not taken. It is unjust in every way in which you can view it.

The true rule of damages as established by the courts generally is that you appraise the land independent of the enhanced value that the improvement may produce to the lands of the country generally; appraise the land as you find it, independent of the consideration of the enhanced value caused by the construction of an improvement in that section of the country. Such is the general doctrine of the courts, and such is manifestly the justice of the case. The Constitution of the United States says that a man shall have "compensation," payment, for what you take from him, not indirect benefits, but compensation for what you take. As to the mode of ascertaining that compensation I have before me a case arising in the State of Iowa, Sator vs. The Burlington and Mount Pleasant Plank Road Company, and I suppose a plank road company taking lands is governed by the same principle as a railroad company. In that case the court said:

"In ascertaining what that compensation shall be we see no more practical rule than first to ascertain the fair marketable value of the premises over which the proposed improvement is to pass, irrespective of such improvement, and also the like value of the premises in the condition in which they will be after the land for the improvement has been taken, irrespective of the benefit which will result from the improvement; the difference in value to constitute the measure of compensation."

That is the rule there laid down by the court after full argument; and that is only one case. This principle of common justice and common honesty in dealings between the Government and individuals in condemning and taking their property from them by this power of eminent domain is so strong that it is even incorporated into the constitutions of many of the States. Ohio I have mentioned as one, Kansas as another; and we know that the constitutions of the new States usually embrace within them all the improved clauses of the other State constitutions as from time to time they arise and are established. The provision in the constitution of Kansas is:

"No right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until full compensation therefor be first made in money, or secured by a deposit of money, to the owner, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation."

I am confident that the principle contended for by my friend from Iowa is the correct principle.

Mr. MORRILL. I am satisfied that the general current of authority is against this provision, and I am sure that the justice of the case is equally clear. Now let us consider the provision for a moment. "And shall also deduct from the damages to be awarded to the applicant for the same any increase in the value, due to the construction of the road, of the premises retained by him, provided such premises formed a portion of those taken." That is the proposition: you are to estimate the land, and then you are to deduct from it any supposed value due to it from the construction of the road. What value? That value which is added to this in common with property in the country generally; property situated with reference to the road as this is. I think it would be very difficult to find a decision in any of the courts to justify that. I understand the rule never to have gone further than this: if there be any particular benefit to the residue of the land connected with that which is taken, you may estimate that, but you may not estimate as against the owner's damages any general benefit which is common to him and the whole country; that is no set-off.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from Maine allow me a word?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the utmost extent to which the courts have gone in the assessment of incidental damages is that where there is a claim set up for incidental damages, incidental profits or advantages may be set off against the incidental damages. But the position of the honorable Senator from Maine, that in relation to the positive and absolute value of property that is to be taken, there is not and cannot be any set-off, is a well-established principle.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know that I disagree with the proposition of the honorable Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose not.

Mr. MORRILL. My proposition is that you can only deduct as a set-off against the owner's damages such direct and peculiar advantages as accrue to him in the particular case; but the general improvement which is common to him and to all those situated around him, is not a proper consideration for the estimation of a jury. That is what I mean to say, and I think the authorities on that subject are entirely uniform, so far as I have observed, unless where the courts are controlled by some special statute. I will read from the Massachusetts Digest one decision on this point:

"In estimating damages for land taken for a highway or railroad, any direct and peculiar benefit or increase of value accruing thereby to land of the same owner adjoining or connected with the land taken, and forming part of the same parcel or tract, is to be considered by the jury and allowed by way of set-off; but not any general benefit or increase of value received by such land in common with other lands in the neighborhood, nor any benefit to other lands of the same owner, though in the same town. And when the sheriff instructed the jury that if the owner of land which, by reason of the benefits derived from the railroad, was as valuable as before, was entitled to no damages, the verdict was set aside as having been assessed upon erroneous principles."

Mr. JOHNSON. What was the law in that case?

Mr. MORRILL. This was under the general statute of Massachusetts, in conformity with the provision of the Constitution cited here, securing to the land-owners compensation for land taken by the construction of a railroad. I am sure that this provision of the bill is directly in contravention of this principle.

Mr. HOWARD. If it be in order, for the purpose of reconciling these differences as far as possible I beg to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A further amendment is not in order at the present time.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state it then, as a mere suggestion, if the Senate will allow me to do so. I propose so to amend the clause that it shall read, "and said commissioners, in their assessments of damages, shall appraise such premises at such sum or price as shall when paid be a just compensation to the owner for the property so taken," adopting the language of the Constitution itself, and leaving it to be settled by the courts ultimately, if any question is to grow out of it. [Agreed.]

Mr. HARLAN. Does the Senator intend that to be in lieu of the whole clause?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir, to strike out all the rest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that if the pending amendment be agreed to, striking out the words proposed by the Senator from Iowa to be stricken out, it will be competent to move the amendment now suggested.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask leave of the Senate to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan as a modification of my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be done by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered. Is there any objection to the Senator from Iowa modifying his amendment as proposed?

Mr. HOWE. I object; and if the Senator from Michigan will indulge me, I will state why I object to it. It is my opinion that if Governments in the exercise of this right of eminent domain had never made the owners of private property poorer, it would never have been felt as a public abuse; and if it had never been felt as an abuse, there never would have been this constitutional restriction on the exercise of the right. But it having been found ordinarily to make men poorer instead of richer to take their property for public use, it was deemed necessary to put some restriction upon it. That restriction was not a prohibition against the exercise of the right, but it was subjecting it to this condition, that private property should not be taken without making just compensation.

Now, what is "just compensation?" I should have said, independent of judicial interpretation, that if a man is not made poorer by the taking of a part of his land but is made richer, he gets just compensation by the mere act of taking. If it is put to a use which makes him as well off as he was before or better off, he has just compensation; he has recompense, which is just compensation. But I do understand, as others have said here, that the courts have not taken that view of it. They have not put that interpretation upon it. I understand that the courts have said that if property is taken, a piece of land for railroad purposes, the value of the land taken must be assessed by commissioners or a jury, and that must be paid for.

Mr. JOHNSON. What court has so held?

Mr. HOWE. I am not quoting any particular decision, but I understand that to be the doctrine of the courts generally. I am going to put a qualification on it presently. This must be paid for; but if the owner of that land which is taken has received any special benefit by the taking of it to his other land in the way of draining, if his bogs or swamps have been drained, or any special advantage has been conferred on property not taken, that may be offset against the value of the land which is appropriated to the building of the road. As far as the courts have gone, I believe they still insist—that is my recollection; I have not looked at a law book in reference to this question for a long time—that the commissioners must appraise the land taken at its value at the time of appraisal; and therefore when lands have been enhanced in value by the mere prospect of building a road, the mere proffer of building a road, commissioners have been compelled to make the assessments upon that new basis.

The language which the Senator from Iowa proposes to strike out of this bill is language put in there in order to make the commissioners adopt a rule of assessment which the courts have, as I understand, uniformly repudiated and rejected, to make them assess the general advantages derived from building the road to the land of a man who has some land taken, as well as to other lands in the neighborhood, and to offset that against the value of the land taken. I shall vote to strike out these words, because I do not believe the courts will abandon the position they have taken upon that question. I am in favor of the words preceding these, which call upon the commissioners to assess these lands at the value they had irrespective of the building of the road. I want to see those words incorporated into a law and placed before a court, to see whether they will recognize that rule or not. I believe they will. I believe it is a just rule. I believe the other is just, too, but the courts, I understand, have so uniformly rejected it that I do not think they will acquiesce in it. Therefore I want to retain these words.

But the Senator from Michigan now proposes to incorporate just the language of the Constitution. That language of course is incorporated, let your bill be as it will. It leaves the question for judicial interpretation just as it always has, and the commissioners will be governed by the body of the adjudications as they now stand. The law is just as all other laws have been; it uses the language of the Constitution, and that language will be the controlling language, let the words employed in the bill be what they may. For that reason I ventured to object to the substitution of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan for that offered by the Senator from Iowa. I think we had better strike out the words proposed to be struck out by the Senator from Iowa, because they have been so often rejected by the courts. I think we had better retain the other words, for I do not understand that the courts have ever expressly ruled upon them when found in a law. I think we had better experiment on them.

Mr. WILSON. It is necessary to have an executive session to-day, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will the Senator give way for a motion that when we adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion can only be received by unanimous consent.

Mr. FOOT. I object.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall come to a vote on the proposition before the Senate. I do not wish the discussion renewed again on a future day so as to consume another day. I hope we shall come to a vote.

Mr. HOWARD. I think we could get through the bill to-day if we only addressed ourselves to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Sprague—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Dixon, Howard, Johnson,

Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Riddle, Van Winkle, and Wright—7.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope not. I think we had better go on and finish this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if there is any pressing business in executive session.

Mr. WILSON. We have nominations before us that I think the Senate owes it to the country to confirm to-day.

Mr. HOWARD. Only a very few officers whose nominations are pending before us, except paymasters and quartermasters. There are very few generals, I think. I think the country can well dispense with action on them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 22, nays 7. So the motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 381) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 15, 1856, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM B. ALLISON of Iowa, Mr. JOHN A. J. CRESWELL of Maryland, and Mr. CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE of Wisconsin, managers at the same on its part.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill of the House (No. 381) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 15, 1856, and

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the managers on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. FOOT, Mr. HARLAN, and Mr. POWELL.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to have the question taken on my motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] was excused from service upon the Committee on Finance.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I beg leave to withdraw my motion to be excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there consent that the motion may be withdrawn? The Chair hears no objection.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 21; as follows:

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. HOSMER, of Buffalo, New York. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, Mr. E. C. INGERSOLL, a member-elect from the State of Illinois in the place of Owen Lovejoy, deceased, appeared, was sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, &c., as prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, and took his seat in the House.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS IN OREGON.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Secretary of the Treasury has sent to the Committee on Commerce a little bill which does away with a couple of ports of delivery in Oregon as ports of entry, and recommending that they be attached to the collection district of Oregon. As this is legislation in the right direction, reducing offices and the expenses of the Government, and is promotive of the public interest, I ask that the bill may be introduced and put upon its passage now.

No objection being made,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, introduced a bill to abolish the collection districts of Cape Perpetua and Port Orford, Oregon, and to attach the same to the collection district of Oregon; which was read a first and second time, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRANT OF LANDS TO IOWA.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, the bill (H. R. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. CRESWELL, and Mr. ELDRIDGE as such committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the remainder of the day be devoted to the consideration of private bills, with the exception of reports from conference committees.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. COFFROTH. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WILSON. On that motion I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPALDING and Mr. COFFROTH were appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the House will consider the importance of giving us one day of this week for visiting the hospitals.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 47, nays 42.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COFFROTH. I withdraw the motion. It can be renewed when the House is fuller.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the motion that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SPALDING. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to adjourn over; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The bill provides that Harriet and Emily W. Morris, the unmarried sisters of the late Commodore Henry W. Morris, shall be entitled to the same pension as the brother would have been entitled to had he been totally disabled, to commence from the death of the brother; and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to place the names of Harriet and Emily W. Morris upon the pension roll of Navy pensions; provided, that in case of the death or marriage of either of the said sisters her pension shall cease.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a privileged question. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That when this House adjourns to-day it shall be adjourned to meet next Monday, that the members of the House may have leisure to visit the wounded officers and soldiers of their respective districts and see that they are properly cared for.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "wounded soldiers" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "female acquaintances." [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. I rise to a question of order. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio germane to the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the question of order that the gentleman from Ohio had not the floor to move any amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana resumed his seat and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HOLMAN. I respectfully submit to the Chair that I did not surrender the floor. As soon as the resolution had been read by the Clerk, the Chair said the business of the House would be interrupted by a message from the Senate. I therefore resumed my seat, but did not yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. Upon that statement by the gentleman from Indiana, the Chair will assign him the floor, and decide that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is not before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. A. MYERS. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw that, to permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist upon my demand for the previous question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the previous question is not sustained, will the resolution be open to debate?

The SPEAKER. It will not. It being a motion to adjourn over, it is not debatable. It would be open to amendment if the previous question should not be seconded.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I call for tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BOUTWELL and LAW were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 63, nays 40.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York, called for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ames, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Brooks, James S. Brown, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Donnelly, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Law, Long, Mattory, Marcy, McAllister, McKimney, James R. Morris, Morrison, Neison, Noble, Norton, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Voorhees, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, and Joseph W. White—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Boutwell, William G. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Dawes, Dixon, Driggs, Elliot, Grinnell, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Loan, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Fernando Wood—49.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act to amend the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;" when the Speaker signed the same.

MONTANA TERRITORY.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 15) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows, namely:

That the first amendment of the Senate to the said bill be amended to read as follows, namely: amend section five by striking out in lines one, two, three, and four the following words: "That every free white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been an actual resident of said Territory for thirty days prior to the first election;" and insert in lieu thereof, "all citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, and who are otherwise described and qualified under the fifth section of the act of Congress providing for a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho, approved March 3, 1863;" and in line five of the said section, after the word "said," insert the word "first."

That the Senate recede from its second amendment to the said bill, and that the Senate recede from its third amendment to the said bill.

M. S. WILKINSON,
L. M. MORRILL,
CHARLES R. BUCKALEW,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
EDWIN H. WEBSTER,
WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WEBSTER. With the consent of the House I will make a short explanation of the report. It will be noticed by the House that the report is not signed by all the House committee. I will state that it is a unanimous report of the committee; one of the members failed to sign it in consequence of his absence from the city. He concurred in the report. It will be seen that the report refers to the fifth section of the act providing a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho.

The bill as it now stands, with the report of the committee of conference, is precisely as it passed the House, with a single exception.

The committee of conference in its report restricts that in this manner—not in this language, but this is the meaning of the amendment—that every free white male citizen of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such shall vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is the word "white" in the bill?

Mr. WEBSTER. The word "white" is not in the bill, but the right of voting in the Territory of Montana is to be the same as under the fifth section of the act for the organization of the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. HOLMAN. The inquiry was made whether the word "white" was incorporated in the bill as a qualification of voters. I desire to suggest that although the word "white" is not incorporated, yet that as amended by the committee of conference it is inserted by reference to the fifth section of the act for the organization of the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. WEBSTER. I ask the Clerk to read that fifth section.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That every free white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been an actual resident of said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within the said Territory; but the qualifications of voters, and of holding office, at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly."

Mr. STEVENS. Is that the way it will read under the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. WEBSTER. The word "white" is not in the report of the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. It is in the bill as amended by the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is in the bill by reference to the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. WEBSTER. The report of the committee of conference says that every citizen of the United States, and every person who shall declare his intention to become such, who shall be qualified under the fifth section of the act to organize the Territory of Idaho, shall be entitled to vote. That section provides that the voters shall be white persons. The voters under this bill must be white citizens of the United States, or white persons who have declared their intention to become such. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being on the adoption of the report, the House divided, and there were—ayes 79, noes 21.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Bailly, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Donnelly, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hutchins, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. So the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the House comply with the request of the Senate, and agree to another committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. MORRILL, FARNSWORTH, and GRISWOLD as such conferees on its part.

The House then resumed consideration of private bills on the Speaker's table reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMILY A. LYON.

A bill (H. R. No. 390) for the relief of Emily A. Lyon.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Emily A. Lyon, widow of Alfred M. Lyon, late a sutler in the twenty-third Iowa regiment of infantry, and who died in the service of his country the 17th of May, 1863, upon the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the 17th of May, 1863, to continue during her widowhood; provided, that proof satisfactory to the Commissioner of Pensions be made of the material facts of the petition.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "of the petition" and insert the words "above stated."

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the amendment ought not to be adopted. The bill only requires that proof shall be made of the facts stated in the petition.

Mr. CRESWELL. All the necessary facts are set forth in the bill itself—that she was married, and that her husband died in the service of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the facts set forth in the petition should be established.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana that this amendment has been offered at my suggestion, because the petition is not within the cognizance of the Commissioner of Pensions. Under the order issued by General Grant prior to the commencement of the campaign against Vicksburg, all unnecessary lumber was to be left behind. The husband of this woman took a musket in his hand and fought in all those battles until he was killed at the charge at Black river, which resulted in the capture of a large number of prisoners. He died, leaving his family destitute. Those facts, together with other unnecessary facts, are stated in the petition on file with the committee, but which is not before the Commissioner of Pensions. The bill states all the necessary facts, and those only, and hence the proposed amendment, in order that it might not be necessary to prove unessential facts.

Mr. HOLMAN. The objection the gentleman raises, that the petition is not before the Commissioner of Pensions, is obviated by the fact that the petition is a public record. That petition goes into the record as a part of this case. Upon the facts set forth in that petition, this lady, no doubt, should have a pension, but those facts are not in the bill.

Mr. KASSON. The only trouble is that this petition will have to be withdrawn from the files, certified, and sent to the Commissioner of Pensions. And there may be unnecessary facts set forth in the petition. This lady is a neighbor of mine, and I am acquainted with all the facts. Under the circumstances I think the proviso is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. HALE. Move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. KASSON. I am entirely willing that it should be done, but I do not wish to interfere with the action of the committee in that respect.

Mr. HALE. I will move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not make that motion. The whole case rests upon the petition in this case.

Mr. KASSON. I hope no variation from the general rule will be made in this case. I wish the Commissioner to ascertain that this man was killed in the service of the United States on the 17th of May, 1863, and that this woman was his wife and is now his widow. Those are the material facts. I am perfectly willing that the proviso shall stand, but I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my motion to strike out the proviso.

The amendment offered by Mr. CRESWELL was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. HALE demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

PETER ANDERSON.

A bill (H. R. No. 419) for the relief of Peter Anderson.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Peter Anderson the sum of $1,128, being in full for back pension, at the rate of six dollars per month, from the day he received his wounds to the day his pension commenced, under award of the Commissioner of Pensions, that is to say, from November 7, 1847, to July 13, 1863.

Mr. HALE demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REBECCA SCOTT.

A bill (H. R. No. 436) granting a pension to Rebecca Scott, widow of Major John B. Scott, late of the United States Army.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Rebecca Scott, of Maryland, widow of the late Major John B. Scott, of the United States Army, on the pension roll, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, and to pay her a pension at that rate from the 22d of November, 1860, during her widowhood.

Mr. HALE demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY SCALES ACCARDI.

A bill (H. R. No. 394) for the relief of Mary Scales Accardi.

The bill directs the name of Mary Scales Accardi to be placed on the roll of invalid pensioners at the rate of six dollars per month, commencing at the date of her husband's death.

Mr. HALE demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN C. MCCONNELL.

A bill (H. R. No. 461) for the relief of John C. McConnell.

The bill appropriates $2,000 in full for money advanced by John C. McConnell for raising troops in the State of Maryland.

Mr. HALE demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to make some inquiries about this bill. I believe it comes from the Committee of Claims, and probably the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HALE] will explain the basis upon which this appropriation is sought to be made. I believe it is a claim for the arming of the first, second, and third Maryland regiments.

Mr. HALE. It appears from the facts which were before the committee that Colonel McConnell has raised a large number of troops and has paid a large sum of money out of his own pocket for the subsistence of those troops, for which he never received any compensation. The committee believed that the Government of the United States ought justly to compensate him for his expenses. He claims a much larger sum than this, but this is the amount which we thought we ought to allow him. It is a very long story and it is not worth while to repeat it now. The committee were satisfied of the justice of the claim, and that he really expended the money in raising troops. I demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARGARET L. STEVENS.

A bill (H. R. No. 195) for the relief of Margaret L. Stevens, widow of General Isaac I. Stevens. The bill provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Margaret L. Stevens, widow of Isaac I. Stevens, late Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Washington, such sum per annum for the time he served as superintendent as was allowed by law to the superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Oregon by the act of Congress approved June 5, 1850; provided the sum shall not exceed the sum of $4,000.

Mr. HALE. I move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania would withdraw the previous question, in order to have the report in this case read.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw for that purpose.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire also that the letters from the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be read.

The report was read, as follows:

"The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Margaret L. Stevens, widow of General Isaac I. Stevens, make the following report:

"That said Isaac I. Stevens was, on the 9th of May, 1853, appointed Governor of Washington Territory, and ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs, in which capacity he served until the 31st day of May, A. D. 1857; that during that time, under instructions of the proper officers of the Government, he negotiated many important treaties with various Indian tribes; that, by the treaty with the Flatheads and other Indians, the Government obtained a title to 14,720,000 acres of land, and by the treaty with the Nez Percés 15,400,000 acres were acquired; that by the treaties with the Quinault and Gullehute Makah, Wyamish, Walla-Walla, Nisqually, and other Indians, immense quantities of land were acquired by the Government; and that in 1855 he was party to making the treaty with the Blackfeet and other Indians east of the Rocky mountains. His labors were varied, extensive, important, difficult, and dangerous, and were always performed with ability and fidelity to the Government. He received as Governor a salary of $1,500 per annum, and as superintendent of Indian affairs a salary of $1,500. By the act of Congress approved June 5, 1850, the superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Oregon received a salary of $2,500 per annum. Your committee believe that the duties performed by General Stevens were far more arduous and important than those performed by the superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, and as much of General Stevens's labor was, under instructions of the Government, performed outside of the limits of his superintendency, your committee are of opinion that he is justly entitled to receive the additional sum of $1,000 per annum for said services.

"General Stevens was killed at the battle of Chantilly, on the 1st day of September, 1862, at the head of the division which he was commanding, and while in the act of bearing the colors and successfully rallying the regiment in advance.

"Your committee, therefore, report a bill for the relief of the petitioner, and respectfully ask its passage by the House."

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire of the gentleman who reported this bill whether—General Stevens having been paid his regular salary as Indian agent and as Governor of the Territory—this bill would not establish a precedent for every Governor of a Territory making a similar claim?

Mr. WINDOM. That precedent has been already established, and this bill only follows a precedent established in Oregon Territory. I wish to have the other papers read.

Mr. UPSON. If I am rightly informed the widow of General Stevens is already receiving a pension of fifty dollars per month, being twenty dollars more than the regular rate allowed by the pension law. I am not aware that General Stevens himself ever in his lifetime claimed compensation for those services, or deemed himself entitled to it.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know what pension Mrs. Stevens is receiving. But with regard to the other point, that General Stevens never made this claim during his lifetime, I have to say that among his papers was found a bill prepared for this very purpose. It is well known that General Stevens devoted far more attention to the public business than he did to his private business. I am satisfied that this bill should pass. It is strongly urged by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and some gentlemen were willing the other day to vote a large amount of money on their recommendation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is a very ungracious thing at all times, Mr. Speaker, to oppose these private bills; and it is by me considered particularly so in this case. I knew Governor Stevens well, and served with him many years in this House. He was an accomplished gentleman and a brave officer. He was Governor of Washington Territory and ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs. He discharged his duties, I believe, faithfully and well; but did no more than his duty. He received his salary and went out of office. He has since died nobly on the field of Chantilly. But I do not see on what possible ground this additional salary can be given. I do not see what good reason there can be in this case for voting to the widow of General Stevens, whom I know to be an excellent lady in all the relations of life, this additional salary.

Mr. NELSON. As a member of the committee, the same question suggested by the gentleman from Illinois occurred to my mind—that General Stevens received his salary; and I desired to know why this additional salary should be voted. The answer seemed to me to be perfectly conclusive—that this was outside and beyond his duty as Governor of the Territory. He had performed the duties of Indian agent, and made various treaties by which the Government had been greatly benefited. And I found that it had been the practice of the Government, by bill, to pay additional compensation where a man merited it. All the facts are embodied in the report. The papers from the Department will satisfy my friend from Illinois, if he looks into them, that these duties, being outside his strict duties as Governor, entitle him to a greater compensation than $1,500. I asked the same question which has been asked here, why General Stevens did not make this claim in his lifetime, and it was established conclusively that he had prepared a bill against the Government for these services. It was found in his own handwriting among his papers when he died.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am not entirely clear that the Government ought to pay an additional amount for the services of Governor Stevens for his services as superintendent of Indian affairs. It was his duty ex officio to negotiate these treaties. That was for what this office was established, and he therefore only did his duty. If he had been entitled to anything more under the law, he would have presented his claim to the Indian department, and would have been paid. But it seems there was no demand made upon the Government.

The gentleman says there was a bill found among the papers of Governor Stevens, in his handwriting, which was to have been presented to Congress, but which it seems was not presented to Congress. That of itself negatives the idea that he would have been entitled to any pay without the passage of an act of Congress.

Now, sir, I should be as willing as any man here to vote anything I could properly for the widow of General Stevens, but it is for us to be just before we are generous, and I am told by the gentleman from Michigan that we have very properly placed Mrs. Stevens on the roll of pensioners at fifty dollars a month. I have now the act before me granting that pension, approved March 3, 1863, entitling her to a pension of fifty dollars a month, which she is receiving at this time, it being twenty dollars a month beyond the amount to which she would have been entitled under the general law.

Mr. McBRIDE. I desire to say to the gentleman that these extra services were to a great extent performed outside of Washington Territory. Governor Stevens spent at one time almost a whole year in the Rocky mountains outside of Washington Territory.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. He was at this time, however, Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, was he not?

Mr. McBRIDE. He was.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then the Government was entitled to his whole services.

Mr. McBRIDE. I will say that Congress has already established a precedent for this bill by a law passed two years ago paying Anson Dart for precisely similar services.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I know all about that claim, and there is no private claim I ever voted for which I more regret. It was an utterly bogus claim. I think, Mr. Speaker, we have no right in a case of this kind to set a precedent on which every man who was ever superintendent of Indian affairs may come here and put in his claim for additional salary.

These, sir, are the facts. I have the greatest respect for the memory of General Stevens, and I have the greatest regard for his estimable lady, but I do not believe we have any right in these times to vote back salaries of this description. It is impossible to tell what it may lead to. My friend from Minnesota, who comes here as a Representative from his district, does credit and is doing very great service to his constituents, and why may they not as well come here and demand additional compensation for him?

In regard to this case of Dart, if it was a case which should be considered a precedent for anything, it is not precisely similar to this. There were other considerations for which that additional compensation was paid. The act states that it was also to indemnify him for expenses incurred for an extra assistant clerk and for the board of an Indian interpreter employed by him. The act provided for a great deal more than merely for additional salary.

Mr. McBRIDE. There is one thing in connection with this case which I desire to state. General Stevens had always been in the service of the Government. He was a graduate of West Point, and from the time he graduated until his death his entire time was spent in the service of the Government, I believe, with the exception of two or three months before he was elected to Congress in 1861. He gave no time to his private affairs, and in fact has left his family almost entirely destitute, as I believe is generally the case with that class of men.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to say in relation to the case of Anson Dart, which the gentleman from Illinois says does not furnish a precedent, that the act distinctly provides a salary of $4,000 a year for his services. The other provisions for indemnifying him, &c., have nothing to do with that. I say, therefore, that it is a precisely parallel case, and that if Anson Dart was entitled to $4,000 a year salary, Governor Stevens was entitled to the same amount.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to call attention to this joint resolution for the relief of Anson Dart. The amount appropriated is $4,000 a year, but how much of that sum is intended to indemnify him for services of assistant clerk six months and for board of Indian interpreter employed by him during the time he was acting as superintendent is not stated.

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot, nor do I think it is necessary under any fair interpretation of the joint resolution. In the first place, the joint resolution appropriated to Anson Dart $4,000 per annum; and then it further provides that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall settle with him on principles of justice and equity for expenses incurred, &c. The latter, it will be seen, is distinct from the former proposition. He gets $4,000 per annum, and also the settlement of his claim for expenses.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota, as he is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ought to understand the Anson Dart case, whether anything was paid in addition to the $4,000 per annum? Was not that $4,000 per annum considered as all that was due to Dart?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know the facts of the Dart case. I do not think it could be so considered under any fair construction of the joint resolution.

The bill before the House provides that Mrs. Stevens shall have the same sum that was paid to Anson Dart. I do not know whether that is a proper case or not. I have only alluded to it for the purpose of showing that we are not establishing a new precedent in this case. The services performed by the late Governor Stevens were performed outside of his Indian superintendency. The salary that he received was small; and for these services that he was ordered to discharge by the proper officers it is only just and fair that he should have compensation.

Our opinion was not only founded upon the statements of the memorial, but we had also the statements in favor of the claim by the proper officers of the Government. It was recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and by the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, I do not see, because the Government has been liberal to the widow of General Stevens for his gallantry during this war, by giving her a pension, that we should deny this just claim for his past services.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I want to know what kind of precedent we are establishing in this case. At an early day of the session I had occasion to present the petition of Mrs. General Sumner for compensation for the services of her husband, who for a time acted as Governor of California. The committee of this House not only denied that claim, but did not propose to pay her a pension of $600 per annum. If this bill passes, I shall make a similar proposition in the case of Mrs. General Sumner.

Mr. HALE. This case is sufficiently understood by the House. The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is recommended by the proper officers. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Bailly, Jacob B. Blair, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Dawson, Dixon, Donnelly, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Elliot, Finck, Garfield, Gooch, Grimes, Jencks, Hale, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Herck, Higby, Jencks, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Long, Marcy, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perlman, Perry, Price, Pruyn, Samuel J. Raudall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Scott, Smith, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph A. So the bill was passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN TRIBES IN NEW MEXICO.

A bill (H. R. No. 108) authorizing the making of treaties with the Navajo, Apache, and Utah Indian tribes, in New Mexico, defining their limits, and extinguishing their title to lands outside of said limits, reported back from the Committee of the Whole with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill was so referred.

CHARLES M. POTT.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill for the relief of Charles M. Pott, in order that it may be acted on now. I will say that this is one of the first bills referred to that committee, but which the committee has failed to report at an earlier day, for the reason that they waited for the testimony by which this claim is made good. I trust the House will dispose of it now.

No objection being made,

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill for the relief of Charles M. Pott; which was read a first and second time.

The bill requires the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Charles M. Pott, late of company K, one hundred and seventy-ninth Pennsylvania militia, on the pension roll at the rate of eight dollars a month from the date of discharge, March 7, 1863, for total disability sustained by loss of an arm by accident while in the hospital detained for his pay after his discharge had been ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

JOSIAH O. ARMES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Some three or four weeks ago, perhaps longer, a bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole to the House for the relief of Josiah O. Armes. I would inquire whether that bill does not come up in its regular order this morning?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman probably was not in the House when the Chair stated that this bill could be called up at any time on Friday by any gentleman who desired, for action by the House. It was called up at one time, and was laid over on the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] that it would be taking precedence of other bills. It was laid over with the right to call it up at any time on private bill day.

Mr. HALE. I call it up now.

The bill requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Josiah O. Armes, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $9,500, in full for damages sustained by him in consequence of the burning of his buildings and the destruction of his property, at Anandale, Fairfax county, Virginia, by the United States troops.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to postpone the consideration of the bill until the next session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HALE] is upon the floor.

Mr. HALE. I wish to state, for the information of the House, that this bill is to indemnify Mr. Armes for the destruction of his property by the United States troops, in Fairfax county, Virginia, during the present rebellion. The amount reported by the committee is much less than the loss he sustained, as proven by his witnesses, but the committee, in view of the ex parte character of the testimony necessarily received on the question of the value of the property destroyed, agreed to allow him a very low value for the property which was admitted to have been destroyed by the military authority in command of that department. It consisted of a large and valuable stone structure erected for a seminary, and cost $20,000. It was used by the rebels as a sort of fort or lookout, and when our troops took possession, that stronghold of the enemy was burned by order of the military officer in command.

Mr. Armes is proved to have given valuable information to our generals, and his loyalty was indorsed by the general commanding in that department. And indeed his wife suffered so much on account of her loyalty, that disease fastened upon her by which she lost her life. Everything the man had in the world was invested in that property. He is a poor man, and entirely destitute of the means of support, as all his property has been taken and destroyed by our Government. It does seem to me that if ever there was a claim for indemnity which appealed to the justice as well as to the humanity of Congress, it is a claim of this character.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether this claim has been presented to the Court of Claims?

Mr. HALE. It has not.

Mr. SLOAN. I am informed that this claim was presented to the Court of Claims, and that while it was pending in that court this application for relief was made to Congress.

Mr. HALE. I am not aware of that fact.

Mr. SLOAN. I suppose the Court of Claims has jurisdiction of claims of this kind, and if that be true, why not refer it to that tribunal?

Mr. HALE. I do not answer the gentleman one way or the other, because I do not know that the fact he states is true.

Mr. WEBSTER. I am convinced that it is not the fact.

Mr. HALE. Whether true or not, this House has jurisdiction.

With this statement of facts, as I do not wish to take up the time of the House or to make any further statement, as there is no dispute about the facts, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not demand the previous question on a claim which I undertake to say involves more than any other private claim before Congress.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order during the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand. I notified the gentleman long ago that I desired to speak upon this bill.

Mr. HALE. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Only a few moments. I only wish to speak now to the question of postponement, and to state briefly the considerations in support of it. The gentleman ought not to object to that.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman renew the demand for the previous question?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will yield the floor to the gentleman to renew it.

Mr. Speaker, the amount which is provided to be paid under this bill is not in itself of any great importance when we consider the millions, tens of millions, and hundreds of millions we are daily voting. It only amounts to $9,500. But I undertake to say that by the passage of this bill we shall establish a precedent which will take from the Treasury $500,000,000. It is no more nor less than the establishment of the principle that the Government is bound to pay for all the casualties of war, to pay every citizen who may have lost property through the casualties and misfortunes of war, and indemnify him for losses which have occurred in the prosecution of the present contest. Hence it is one of the most important measures that we can be called upon to consider. I understood the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who reported the bill, to say that while he had very great doubts in regard to the principle, he was willing to report it in order that the House might pass upon the question involved. That gentleman, I believe, considered that it involved one of the most important principles upon which we could be called to act.

Now, sir, I propose to postpone this bill until the next session of Congress, for two reasons. The first is, that the House may have time to consider fully all the important questions which bear upon the case; and second, that we may understand the position which the case holds in the Court of Claims. I am advised, by authority which I consider good, that this very case is now pending in the Court of Claims, and is there for its decision.

The bill provides, as I have said, for the payment to Mr. Armes of the sum of $9,500 in full for damages sustained by him in consequence of the burning of his building and the destruction of his property in the progress of the war.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has referred to the personal status and sufferings of Mr. Armes, and in all cases of this class the character and the situation and the hardships of the individual are brought in, in order to enlist the sympathies of the House and get the claim through.

Now, I am willing to concede all that the gentleman says in favor of Mr. Armes. I believe he is a loyal citizen. I am willing to concede that he gave valuable information to the Government, and if it was possible I would vote to pay him for all the valuable information he gave to the Government. But such concessions do not touch the real merits of this question at all. I will concede that he has lost property, but I will not concede that he is such a loser of property as, according to national law, entitles him to be indemnified by the Congress of the United States.

This question, sir, has been fully settled over and over again. It was settled over and over again after the last war with Great Britain. I believe it is a part of history that the city of Buffalo was burned by the enemy, and vast amounts of property destroyed for which indemnity was claimed as in this case. That city had claims to the amount of millions of dollars, claims resembling that of Mr. Armes now before us, and the question of the election of a member of Congress in that district turned for years, as I am told, upon that question; but I believe that Congress constantly and persistently refused to pay the claims. Why? Because it was against national law. No Government upon the face of the earth has ever undertaken to pay claims of this kind, for the very reason that no Government ever could pay such claims. Those casualties and damages which happen to the citizen during a war are like casualties by fire and flood and earthquake. A man may suffer by having his property destroyed by fire or tornado or lightning, but does that, while it excites our sympathies, give him the right to demand of Congress that we shall tax all of our constituents to indemnify him for his misfortune? No, sir. No such principle exists or ever has existed, for no nation could ever stand up under it, and for one I protest against its establishment in this case, entailing untold millions more of public debt on the country.

Sir, I have a case in point in the Black Hawk war. The portion of the country which I represent was ravaged and devastated in that war, thirty years ago. Houses were destroyed by the enemy, fields ravaged, fences torn down, crops ruined, and great damage done to the people by the prevalence of Indian war. Congress was applied to for general relief, but it never gave it. The first session that I served in Congress I presented a petition asking for an indemnity very much like that asked here for Mr. Armes. The petition was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. That committee considered it fully, and made a unanimous report adversely to the claim, settling the principle which, I say, should govern us in this case, and in all cases of a like character. I beg the attention of the House to the report made by Mr. Orr, who was at that time chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and who, though now a traitor in arms against our Government, is a man of great ability, and who fully mastered all questions he undertook to consider. I read from his report, which I have before me:

"The claims, for the payment of which a general law is now asked to be passed, have been, in a great measure, specifically brought before Congress and rejected. An adverse report on these claims was submitted at the first session of the Twenty-Fourth Congress, which was sustained by the House, thereby rejecting the claims now sought to be revived and discharged. The committee have been furnished by the Indian Bureau with abstracts of a great number of these claims. The abstracts are predicated upon the report of a commission organized under the direction of General Atkinson, in January, 1833. The commissioners, Captain Palmer and William Hempstead, Esq., were charged with the duty of 'collecting, adjusting, and examining all outstanding claims arising from the movements of the militia and friendly Indians called into service' during the spring and summer of 1832. All the claims on file in the Indian Bureau, (and your committee are satisfied that they embrace all contemplated in the resolution which is the occasion of this investigation,) though presented to and received by the commissioners, were not within the limits of their instructions, and were consequently disallowed. This decision of the commissioners, which was approved by the Indian Bureau, it is not pretended violated any right of the claimants under existing laws or the uniform practice of the Government. Should Congress now interpose a remedy, and pay that class of claims to which the resolution refers? Your committee think not. The depredators, the Sac and Fox Indians, were at war with the United States. Soon after the commencement of hostilities the inhabitants on the Indian frontier abandoned their homes, crops, and property, and sought safety by retreating into the denser white settlements. It is alleged by some of the claimants that their absence from home, occasioned by apprehensions of danger from the Indians, prevented them harvesting their growing crops; some ask reparation because they were prevented, from the same cause, sowing their crops; and others found their claims upon the seizure and appropriation of their personal property by the hostile savages. Is there anything peculiar in this state of the facts which should authorize and require the Government to pay for these real and speculative losses? The rule which has been uniformly pursued by this Government toward its citizens is to pay only such losses as were occasioned by the action or authority of its own officers. For example, if the buildings of a citizen are occupied by troops, and are destroyed by the enemy on account of such occupancy, the Government will indemnify; but for casualties arising in the progress of the war from the action of the enemy, or the citizen himself, to his property, no indemnity has been made, whether the enemy was white or red; and it would be, in the judgment of your committee, highly inexpedient to change the rule. War is calamitous to the Government as well as to the citizen, and if the former should attempt, in addition to the support of armies and navies, to indemnify the citizen for every personal loss, positive and mediate, it would entail a most burdensome public debt, to be only discharged eventually in national bankruptcy. Every citizen encounters a share of the sacrifice of a national war, and it would not be just to tax all to relieve from that sacrifice a few whose losses may be susceptible of ascertainment, when the great mass have been equal sufferers, remotely, if not directly.

"Your committee, being satisfied that any legislation upon the subject is inexpedient, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of said resolution."

Mr. NELSON. Under the authority of that opinion, is not the claimant in this case entitled to recover?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not so understand the case.

Mr. NELSON. Is not the meaning of that report this: that where property is destroyed by the enemy in war, there the Government does not pay; but where the property is destroyed by officers of our own Government in prosecuting the war, on our part, there the Government does pay. Is not that the authority of the case cited?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There is nothing in the record which shows such a state of fact as the gentleman alludes to.

Mr. WEBSTER. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. After stating that the Government would not pay for casualties arising in the prosecution of a war, the report says—with great truth, and one which should be impressed upon us—

"War is calamitous to the Government as well as to the citizen; and if the former should attempt, in addition to the support of armies and navies, to indemnify the citizen for every personal loss, positive and mediate, it would entail a most burdensome public debt, to be only discharged eventually by national bankruptcy."

That, sir, is the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House; and it applies, I contend, to this very question. That report was adopted unanimously by the House, and became the law of the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. NELSON] asks me if the case in question does not come within the exception as laid down by the report. I answer that it does not, for it is not shown that the property was destroyed by the command of an officer who had a right to give the command. The party claiming on that ground must be held strictly to the proof to bring himself within the rule. All that the report says is that the order was apparently given by the commanding officer; but no order is set out and the name of no commanding officer given. If the property were destroyed by the lawless act of the troops, there can be no pretense of liability on the part of the Government.

I say, therefore, this case involves the great principle of how far and to what extent we are going to pay for these casualties of war; how far we shall be passing this act sanction a principle which will result in national bankruptcy. I had, on a previous occasion, intended to have spoken somewhat at length on a bill brought in by my friend from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; a bill taking away from that court a jurisdiction which I understand they have assumed over cases of this kind. I had examined into these questions as they have arisen heretofore in this country, and had addressed a letter to Hon. William Whiting, the very able Solicitor of the War Department, with a view to ascertain the nature and amount of the war claims now being presented for payment at the War Department. Mr. Whiting sent me a reply ably reviewing the whole matter, which I will have read to the House.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, January 15, 1864.

SIR: Your letter of the 13th instant has been received, in which you have requested me to "state, if consistent with my views of public duty, the nature, extent, and character of the various claims which have come to my notice against the Government, growing out of the loss and destruction of property during the present rebellion; and also to make any general suggestions on the subject that may seem proper."

In reply, I have the honor to state that a great variety of claims have been made against the United States, growing out of the loss or destruction of property in the southern States. Damages have been claimed by loyal citizens who have always resided in the northern States for real estate situated in the rebellious districts, and taken into possession of the Union troops for military purposes, as for quarters, or for storage, or hospitals, barracks, &c.

Damages have also been asked by the same class of persons for personal property, as cotton, sugar, flour, horses, mules, wagons, agricultural implements, money of the United States, money of the confederates, hay, grain, corn, and all kinds of forage, wood for burning, and wood cut down but not removed from the spot when cut, and damages for crops trampled or eaten up by our cavalry, &c.

But by far the larger proportion of claims are made by persons residing in the disloyal districts, for every species of real and personal property alleged to have been used, injured, seized, or destroyed by our troops: fences burned, crops trampled down or consumed by the Army; horses, mules, beef cattle, captured, seized, and taken away; money, furniture, and household articles, lost or stolen; cotton captured, burned, used, lost, or damaged by dirt or otherwise in the use of it for military or naval forces. Every variety of personal property lawfully captured by our forces has been claimed, or damages have been demanded for its use, detention, or destruction. Rents are continually requested for the use of real estate seized by our troops. Property which has been condemned as lawful prize in our courts has been claimed, or its value in damages.

And, what is singular, every claimant purports on affidavits to be a loyal citizen, even when in some cases it is well known to the Department that the party really interested in the claim is actively engaged in rebellion at the time the claim is presented.

Respectable gentlemen, on many occasions, act as claim agents on behalf of the parties interested.

Often it happens that shift is made in the title or apparent title of property, in order that the party making the application may be deemed loyal. And were we to regard the evidence presented to this Department as conclusive on the question of loyalty, it would be doubtful whether there is, or ever was, a disloyal person in the seceded States.

Many claims have been made for property seized in attempts to violate the laws regulating the commerce with the inhabitants of the rebellious States. Few, if any, instances have occurred of claims for restoration of property seized in transitu on its course from Maryland, New York, or other States to Virginia without being accompanied by testimony of the loyalty, honesty, and high character of the criminal, even where he has been arrested and caught in the act of violating the law.

Rebel printing offices have been gutted out, secession houses have been burned, arms and munitions of war have been seized, vessels have been used, seized, or captured by our forces, railroads have been taken for military use, their rolling stock has been worn out, tracks have been destroyed, bridges burned or blown up, and every form of devastation and destruction has been inflicted on the enemy's property by our armies.

From all these injuries, the inevitable result of warlike operations, claims arise against the Government from some persons claiming to be loyal, even though residing in the districts at war with us. Whenever the armies move they scatter broadcast the prolific seed which will ripen into claims against the Government.

As to the character of these claims, so far as known to me, some of them have but a slight foundation in fact, many are purely fictitious, and a large proportion of them have been exhibited and unreasonable.

Sometimes the amount of annual rent demanded for a piece of real estate is equal to half or the whole of its value. The valuation placed upon many articles has been more than ten times their real worth; and as a general statement these claims are of so gross and outrageous a character as to stamp them as fraudulent.

Although some claims of this class are fairly stated, yet it would seem as though it were thought fair game by some claimants to rob the Treasury to any practicable extent.

In answer to the inquiry as to the amount of these claims which have been or will be brought against the Government, I can only say that it is impossible to ascertain the aggregate. I believe that hundreds of millions of dollars will be required to satisfy these demands.

If it were now understood that they were allowed and promptly settled in the War Department, and paid by the Treasury, I do not believe that we could carry on the war three months for want of money or credit.

I look upon the army of claimants as really quite as formidable to the Government as the army of rebels; and if this great and impending danger is not looked in the face, and promptly and decisively met by Congress, I shall feel a diminished confidence in the ultimate preservation of our national honor.

In regard to all claims arising in the rebellious districts of the character above described, I have uniformly refused to acknowledge their legal validity, whether the claimant is loyal or otherwise. I have not felt at liberty to waive the legal right of the Government to act according to its own will and pleasure in recognizing these obligations. The question as to what shall and what shall not be conceded to persons whether loyal or disloyal, friendly or hostile, who reside in those parts of the country now in rebellion, is a question of public policy to be settled by Congress. Congress may or may not assume such obligations. If they should amount to hundreds of millions of dollars Congress may refuse by recognizing them to add such an amount to our national debt, but if they should be of comparatively trifling amount a different policy might be justified.

Perhaps the time has not yet arrived when we can tell what is best to be done, for we do not know when the war will end, what will be the amount of our debt, nor what the extent of demands upon our national resources.

It therefore seems to me that we ought not to allow any court or tribunal to pass upon this class of claims in anticipation of the action of Congress, however small the amount involved may be, and the Government ought not to commit itself, through any of its legislative or executive departments, or through the Court of Claims, or by any commissioners or other functionaries, to an acknowledgment of the validity of claims of persons residing or having property in rebellious districts while the war is going on.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM WHITING,
Solicitor of the War Department.

HON. EMILIO B. WASHBURN,
United States House of Representatives.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have sent to the Library for the American State Papers, in which this question was considered very fully by Mr. Hamilton in a report made by him while he was Secretary of the Treasury, in which he says:

"That, according to the laws and usages of nations, a State is not obliged to make compensation for damages done to its own citizens by an enemy, or wantonly or unauthorized by its own troops; yet humanity requires that some relief should be granted to persons who by such losses are reduced to indigence and want; and as the circumstances of such sufferers are best known to the States to which they belong, that it be referred to the several States (at their own expense) to grant such relief to their citizens who have been injured, as aforesaid, as they may think requisite; and if it shall hereafter appear reasonable that the United States should make any allowance to any particular States who may be burdened much beyond others, that the allowance ought to be determined by Congress; but that no allowance be made by the commissioners for settling accounts for any charges of that kind against the United States."

That is the rule which was laid down by Mr. Hamilton, and I believe it has been universally followed ever since.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having stated some of the results which will follow the passage of this bill, I move to postpone its further consideration to the third Friday in December; and in accordance with my promise yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield the floor for a motion to postpone to be made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield the floor generally.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I did not understand the gentleman to yield the floor for the purpose of making any such motion as that.

The SPEAKER. The sole condition made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in yielding the floor was that at the close of his remarks he should surrender it again for the purpose of moving the previous question.

Mr. HALE. I first moved the previous question and then yielded the floor to the gentleman from Illinois, on condition that he should renew the demand for the previous question, on condition that he should make the same motion which I had made, which of course would not admit the motion to postpone to intervene.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed at the time that was perhaps the gentleman's intention, but he understood him only to make the condition that he should renew the demand for the previous question or yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania distinctly to decline to allow a motion to postpone to be made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state exactly how the matter stands, and there can be no difference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself. I appealed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the first place to allow me to move to postpone the bill, which he declined to do. I then asked him to withdraw the demand for the previous question, to allow me to make a few remarks. He replied that he would withdraw it provided I would renew the demand. I declined to do that, but said I would yield him the floor as soon as I had finished; I did not understand there was any agreement which would deny me the privilege of making a motion to postpone. If, however, the gentleman from Pennsylvania understands there was, I will not persist in the motion, but will ask the House to permit me to enter it.

Mr. HALE. I certainly did not yield the floor for the purpose of allowing that motion to be made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman insists on the point I withdraw the motion, but I will ask the House to vote down the demand for the previous question to enable me to move to postpone the bill, and I will remark just here that I stated in the outset that what I had to say would be directed to the motion to postpone.

Mr. HALE. That may be very true, but I did not yield for that motion to be made.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask my colleague to yield me the floor for a few moments.

Mr. HALE. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I have but a single word to say. I do not think that the law is at all doubtful. It has been settled, ever since war was first made, by the law of nations that whenever a nation is at war and the enemy destroys the property of one of the belligerents it is his misfortune—he bears it, and no nation pays for that except as a gratuity; as an act of humanity, in the words of General Hamilton. But, on the other hand, it is as well settled that where ever any act of the Government itself causes the destruction of the property of the individual either by taking it for the troops, by storing munitions of war by which the enemy is induced to destroy private property—wherever the Government from military necessity destroys private property, I say, it is quite as clear that every just nation pays its own citizens for such destruction. It does not do to say that it would be a hardship to pay so much. It may be a hardship for me to pay my debts—it is rather a burden, [laughter;] but that is no reason why I should not pay them to the last dollar, at least to recognize them.

How else is this war to be carried on? In the raid by the rebels into Pennsylvania millions of private property were destroyed by the enemy, for which no claim that I know of has been made to Congress. But there was a case in Chambersburg. The Government stored munitions of war in a private building, and the enemy, discovering that fact, destroyed the building and munitions both together. The Government recognized the claim in that case, and paid it at once. Mr. Ames proves that he was a loyal citizen, owning more than nine thousand five hundred dollars' worth of property. Our troops were there, but the enemy took possession of it, using it as a fort. It became, in the judgment of our armies, a military necessity to destroy it. They did destroy it. There is no doubt that our troops did destroy it. This beautiful farm was occupied by the enemy, and it became necessary to dislodge them. The committee infer that it was done by the direct order of the commander of our troops. If it were not done by direct order, if the troops were there in a body and found the enemy sheltering themselves there, and to get at them and destroy them they destroyed the house, it is precisely the same as if they had received an order from the military commander.

Mr. WEBSTER. It will be found in the evidence that this property was destroyed by the order of the military commander.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman be good enough to read that evidence? The committee do not say so.

Mr. WEBSTER. I do not think that the gentleman has read the evidence, as I did not think he had read the law a little while ago.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is no necessity for the gentleman getting into a heat about it. The report of the committee does not state there was such an order. If there be such order I ask the gentleman from Indiana to read it for the benefit of myself and the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me finish my remarks. I have only to say it is asserted here that in consequence of the enemy taking this property and using it as a fort our troops were compelled to destroy it. The committee think that it was destroyed by direct military order. I do not care whether it was destroyed by direct order or not, if it were necessary in the combat to destroy it to dislodge the enemy. The case then comes within the law of nations. No one ever heard of a nation so dishonest as to repudiate such a claim as that. Hence I will go for the bill.

Mr. HALE. Before I proceed further I wish to state a fact in reference to the destruction of this property by military authority. General Heintzelman, in command of that department as military governor, stated, in a letter to the committee, that this property was destroyed by the military authority of the United States. That was considered by the committee as sufficient evidence of the fact. It is well known that no record is kept by persons commanding companies of the property destroyed by them; but a superior officer said, in a letter, that this property was destroyed by the military authority of the United States. That being a fact established, the only questions, it seemed to us, were whether the claimant was loyal, and what was the value of the property. Is there any reason why the property should not be paid for, whether taken by the Government for use, or taken by the Government and destroyed? In either case it is lost to the owner. That would be a very strange Government that would take the property of its citizens for its own use, or for the purpose of destroying it, and then refuse to pay for it.

But if the Government destroys property for its own purposes, it would be, according to the idea of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] improper for us to pay for it. Why should we not pay for it as soon as we would if we had used it? There is no principle of morals or of law which would excuse an individual from the payment of property so taken by him and destroyed. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that that would be a most odious Government which would take the property of its own citizens and refuse to make just compensation. It may be necessary in the prosecution of a war to destroy the property of citizens in order that military operations may be carried on with more success, or it may be necessary to use it for feeding the army.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman allow me to have an affidavit read?

Mr. HALE. For what purpose?

Mr. WINDOM. It bears upon the fact of this property being destroyed by order of General Stahl.

Mr. HALE. I will hear it.

The Clerk read the affidavit, which is as follows:

District of Columbia, City of Washington, to wit:

On the 19th day of March, A. D. 1863, before me, the subscriber, a justice of the peace in and for said county, personally appeared Captain Max P. Amelunson, of the sixty-eighth regiment New York State volunteers, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God that on or about the latter part of November or first week in December, 1861, he was present with the regiment to which he was attached when the order was given by General Stahl to destroy all the houses and buildings at Anandale, Fairfax county, Virginia. This deponent further declares that the houses and barns owned by Professor J. O. Armes at Anandale were destroyed at the same time; that the order for the destruction of the houses and barns in that vicinity was deemed a military necessity at the time, and that the object for thus ordering the destruction of said houses and barns was to clear the place of rebel pickets who would secrete themselves and shoot down Federal pickets and soldiers; and further, that this deponent has no pecuniary interest in the matter.

MAX P. AMELUNSON,
Captain Sixty-Eighth Regiment New York Volunteers.

Sworn to and subscribed.

JOHN H. JOHNSON, Jr.,
Justice of the Peace.

[L. S.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is that the kind of evidence by which they support claims in the courts of Minnesota?

Mr. HALE. The affidavit which has been read establishes the fact, if any more evidence was necessary for that purpose, that the property was destroyed by our own troops under the authority of United States officers, in order for the more successful prosecution of the war in that quarter; and the law read by the gentleman from Illinois establishes the fact that every just Government recognizes its obligation to make just compensation for property taken for its own use or destroyed by its authorized officers. We do not propose to pay for property destroyed by the rebels, but by our own Government. Is it possible that our Government has arrived at that stage that it will take the property of its own citizens for any purpose whatever and refuse to make compensation? If we are too poor to do that we are too poor to prosecute this war. But I deny that we are too poor to do justice by our citizens. We would not deserve the name of a Government if we did not compensate citizens for our own acts. And the gentleman from Illinois entirely overrates the amount which will be required to pay for these losses.

Now, I claim to know something upon this subject. The whole amount of the claims presented to the Committee of Claims at this session will not amount, in my judgment, to $150,000. The largest claim is that of the Columbia bridge; the others are all of small amount. But I care not whether they amount to one million or five million dollars; if the claims are just and right we ought to allow them. The only question in a case of this sort is, is it right, is it just? Every claim, I trust, when it comes before Congress will be decided upon its own merits. We are not compelled to ask the opinion of Mr. Whiting what we ought to do. We are competent to decide the question for ourselves. When a claim comes here let us examine the case and decide upon the merits, and when we want Mr. Whiting's opinion whether we ought to pay our just debts or not, we will ask it. In my opinion, the honor of the Government, which he says will be stained by paying these claims, will be much more injured by not paying them. Our honor can never be hurt by paying our just debts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say our honor would be stained by the payment of these claims.

Mr. HALE. I did not say the gentleman did; but Mr. Whiting says our honor will not be preserved if we pay these claims.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose he meant that if we paid all these claims brought in in this way we could not pay other claims, and therefore maintain our honor.

Mr. HALE. Well, that may be so. His letter speaks for itself. I hold that we cannot maintain our honor by not paying these claims, if they are just and right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up the time of the House in discussing this claim. I think it is fully understood. There is no dispute about the facts, about the loyalty of Mr. Armes, or about his poverty; and with all due respect to the gentleman from Illinois, I think his poverty is a reason why we should pass this bill now, and not postpone it until next session. If it were the claim of a rich man it might more properly be postponed, but Mr. Armes has nothing; you have taken his all, and consequently what we give him we must give him promptly, to save him from starvation. He is an old man, a poor man, a weak and sickly man, and I hold that it is our duty to act in this matter now. I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I appeal to the gentleman, inasmuch as I acted under a misapprehension, to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and let me make the motion to postpone, so that the House may pass upon it.

Mr. HALE. I prefer not to do it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope the House will vote down the previous question.

Mr. HALE. And I hope not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HALE. For what purpose?

Mr. HOLMAN. A question has been raised as to whether this claim is before the Court of Claims or not.

Mr. HALE. It is not before the Court of Claims. I have received information from Mr. Armes since this case came up that it is not before the Court of Claims at all.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 69, noes 34.

The main question was then ordered to be put. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HALE demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Baily, Jacob B. Blair, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chandler, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. So the bill was passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 192) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1865, and moved that the amendments be printed, and their consideration postponed till Monday next, after the morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion to allow me to offer a resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let us hear the resolution.

Mr. COX. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the forcible seizure by the Federal military authorities at New York of the offices of the New York World and Journal of Commerce, and the suspension of those papers for the innocent publication of a forged State paper, is an act unwarranted by the circumstances connected with said publication, an arbitrary outrage on the constitutional rights of citizens, and deserves the reprobation of every friend of public liberty and private rights.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill (S. No. 134) to provide for the better organization of the quartermaster's department; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. ELIOT asked unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Commerce a bill to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, in order to have the same recommitted and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, objected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SMITH called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Freeman Clarke, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dixon, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Gooch, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McBride, McIndoe, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, John O'Neill, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Alexander H. Rice, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Spalding, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Tracy, Upson, Wadsworth, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—68.

YAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, John D. Baldwin, Brooks, William G. Brown, Cobb, Coltoth, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Grinnell, Hale, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Loan, Longyear, McClurg, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Noble, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ross, Schenck, Smith, Thayer, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Windom, and Woodbridge—48.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House thereupon (at a quarter to four o'clock p. m.) adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 21, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I present the credentials of Hon. WILLIAM M. FISHBACK, elected a member of this body from the State of Arkansas, which I ask to have read. As the Senate is not full to-day, on consultation with some other Senators, I will not make a motion that Mr. FISHBACK be sworn in as a member until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read for information.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

State of Arkansas, to wit:

The General Assembly of this State on the 5th day of May, 1864, having, in pursuance with the Constitution of the United States of America, chosen WILLIAM M. FISHBACK a Senator of the United States to fill the unexpired term of William K. Sebastian.

Therefore, I, Isaac Murphy, Governor of the State of Arkansas, do hereby certify the same to the Senate of the United States.

[L. S.] Given under my hand and the seal of the State of Arkansas, this 7th day of May, 1864.

ISAAC MURPHY,
Governor of Arkansas.

By the Governor:

ROBERT J. T. WHITE, Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will lie upon the table.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair whether this would be the proper time, or on Monday, when it is suggested the motion will be made to swear in the Senator from Arkansas, to move to refer these credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary with power to inquire into the election and qualifications of the person who is proposed to be admitted as a member of the body. If Monday will be the proper time I will wait until Monday, and then if any other Senator desires to make the motion I will not make it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. There is no question as to the regularity of the credentials. According to the precedent established in the session before the last, I think the proper motion would be to refer the motion to swear in the member.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to be informed as to what the proposition before the Senate is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no distinct proposition before the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Then if it be in order I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the order of the day, the unfinished business of yesterday, the Pacific railroad bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now in order.

Mr. CONNESS. Prior to that motion, I move that the credentials presented be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the Senate not to act on that motion immediately. I should like the whole question to come up on Monday.

Mr. CONNESS. I am perfectly willing that the motion shall lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken if there be no objection. The credentials will lie, with the motion, on the table.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FOOT. I move, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate, to take up for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 43, relating to the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings; and on that motion I have a word of remark by way of explanation.

This bill has been on the Calendar for more than four months. It has been twice taken up for action, partially considered, and superseded by the special orders. I have deferred, on several occasions, calling it up for action, in deference to the wishes and convenience of the Senators from Indiana, at their request, in consequence of the absence of one of the Senators at the time, not being disposed to take any advantage of the absence of any Senator who felt an interest in this question. I therefore move to take it up for consideration at this time. If the motion is carried, when the bill is before the Senate, I shall very cheerfully give way for the introduction of the ordinary business of the morning hour.

Mr. COLLAMER. I had hoped that the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday, being the bill for the establishment of a line of ocean steamers to Brazil, might be taken up this morning, if we took up anything except the ordinary calls of the morning business. In the state in which that bill stands unfinished, I desire to have it closed.

Mr. FOOT. I will say in reply to the suggestion of my colleague that this bill has been twice up before, and partially considered, and superseded by the special orders of the day and left as the unfinished business twice, but there is no rule giving precedence to the unfinished business of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate. With the indulgence of the Senator from Vermont the Chair will now receive petitions and memorials.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FOOT presented memorials of citizens of the towns of Castleton and Milton, Vermont, and a memorial of citizens of the town of Granville, New York, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of citizens of the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. NESMITH. I prefer that the bill should be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 43) relating to the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings, the question being on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, it will be remembered that when this subject was last before the Senate I spoke somewhat at length and gave the reasons for my opposition to this bill. I do not desire now to trespass on the time of the Senate by repeating those reasons. I am more and more satisfied, however, by subsequent reflection that I was correct in those conclusions. I wish now simply to have a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the committee, read, which will put the Senate in possession of all the facts, and then so far as I am concerned I am willing that the vote shall be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 22, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to communicate for the information of yourself and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, copies of reports recently made to me by the architect and superintendent of the Capitol extension, and other papers, which explain to some extent my action with reference to the matters to which they relate.

It will be perceived from my letter to Mr. Walter of the 11th instant, (paper marked E,) that I was induced to call for a report from him in consequence of the conversation you had held with me upon the subject. For the same reason I directed Mr. West, the superintendent and disbursing agent, to make the detailed report of expenditures herewith furnished, marked B.

I presume I am not mistaken in the inference that Senate bill No. 43 was subsequently introduced by you in consequence of your belief that there had been and was still some mismanagement in the prosecution of the work on the Capitol extension, and that the public interest required that not only that edifice but the Patent Office building also should be withdrawn from the supervision and control of this Department and committed to the care of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds. If this inference is correct, I am of course chargeable with the supposed mismanagement.

That the work might have progressed with greater rapidity and with more economy under the control of another is quite possible; but I would gladly convince you, if the fact will justify it, that my action in the premises has been discreet, and that I have been actuated solely by a desire to practice the utmost economy the nature of the case would justify. Since the work has been under my control but few contracts have been made. Those were for bricks and coal.

Every care was taken to conserve the public interests, and I am confident the articles needed were procured at the lowest possible rates. The principal contracts had all been made when the work was first commenced, and I had only to see that they were faithfully executed. You will remember that, in consequence of the prohibitions contained in certain recent acts of Congress against the decoration and embellishment of the Capitol, by sculpture or painting, or other works of illustrated art, and with a view to avoid what seemed to me an unnecessary expenditure of public money at this particular juncture of national affairs, I suspended the execution of the contract with Mr. Brumedi, for painting the canopy over the eye of the dome, at an expense of $40,000, as soon as I had become aware of its existence, until I was assured by you that the appropriation made by the act of 3d March, 1863, expressly contemplated that work of art, and that in consequence of such assurance, and by your advice, I allowed Mr. Brumedi to resume and continue his labors until I found that the work was not progressing in just proportion to the payments which had been made to him, when I directed that no further advances should be made to him until the work should justify it.

You will perceive from my letter to Mr. West, of the 1st of July, 1863, (paper marked D,) that I entertained the opinion that more economy could and ought to be attained in the prosecution of the work on the Capitol extension and new dome; and while the changes made in its management have not resulted in as great a reduction of expenditure as I had anticipated, something has been saved to the Treasury, and a more thorough and satisfactory control over the work obtained.

I feel it my duty to say a word in justification of the appointment of Captain West as general superintendent and disbursing agent of the Capitol extension.

Mr. French, the disbursing agent, and Mr. Walter, the architect, addressed a communication to this Department, setting forth in strong terms the necessity then existing for the appointment of a general superintendent possessing a knowledge of architectural design and of those branches of mechanical and mathematical science which relate to the principles of construction and of the nature and property of materials. A copy of that communication is herewith, marked C. At the period of its date Mr. Huestis was the superintendent of the stone work, but, notwithstanding the skill in the art claimed for him, both those gentlemen seem, then, to have been of the opinion that it was not adequate for the purpose required. It came to my knowledge that Messrs. French and Walter had previously concluded to address a joint communication to my predecessor, advising him of the incompetency of Mr. Huestis for the position he then held, but for certain reasons, other than a satisfaction with his ability, postponed it. I found that the returns made by him as a basis for the adjustment of the accounts of some of the contractors were not to be relied upon, and that, in consequence of his incapacity, the books of the contractors themselves had to be referred to in order to a settlement of their claims against the Government; and serious objections, not necessary here to mention, appearing against other employees on the work, I determined to have a thorough overhauling of the entire management, and knowing that Captain West possessed all the qualifications for such a general superintending as Messrs. French and Walter had deemed necessary, I appointed him in the first place chief clerk, and, subsequently, disbursing agent and general superintendent of the work. He was an architect of at least average skill in his profession, having been a pupil of Mr. Walter, and had spent much time upon the building and acquired a knowledge of its details. I knew him to be a scholar, and possessed of superior clerical ability, and, withal, a man of the strictest integrity and of more than ordinary capacity. He had been recommended to the President at the commencement of the present Administration by many Senators and Representatives, as well as prominent citizens of Washington and Georgetown, for appointment to the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds. He had served in the Army as assistant quartermaster to the entire satisfaction of the Department until his health became seriously and permanently impaired by exposure. He had been favorably noticed in public orders, and complimented by officers with whom he had served for his fidelity and efficiency. He had manifested his conscientious and disinterested sense of duty by preferring to resign his commission rather than to receive the pay of his rank without being able to perform the duties pertaining to it. I had full faith in him. I wanted just such a man as I knew him to be, and I appointed him. I also devolved upon him the disbursement of the appropriation for the completion of the Washington aqueduct, and thereby effected a further saving of expense to the Government. In this connection I may also state that since the 1st of March, 1863, Mr. Walter, without additional compensation, has performed the duties of architect of the Patent Office building, for which a salary of $2,000 per annum had for some time previously been paid. He was reluctant to supersede the very acceptable and accomplished gentleman who then occupied that position, but I was determined to practice as much economy as possible, and imposed those duties upon him.

The accompanying copy of Mr. Walter's report to me of the 14th instant, marked A, will show in detail the work that has been done with the small appropriation made at the last session of Congress, and what remains to be done. It will also appear therefrom that the only cause of failure to finish the two eastern porticos and steps of the Capitol extension, before the assembling of the present Congress, was the want of marble, which the contractors found it impossible to supply in time, and not the result of any changes the Department saw proper to make in the superintendence and organization of the working parties.

The copy, herewith sent, of the report of the disbursing agent and general superintendent, marked B, will exhibit the total expenditures on the work, and also the cost of the clerical and other administrative force employed on the Capitol extension and new dome in each month of the year 1863. It will be seen from it that while the entire expenditures on the work from the 1st of January to the 30th of June amounted to but $236,539 14, the cost of the clerical and administrative force employed was $12,215 75; and that although the expenditures from the 1st of July (the date when Captain West took charge as disbursing agent and general superintendent) to the 31st of December amounted to $255,359 70, the cost of the clerical and administrative force employed was only $9,081 57, showing an actual saving in six months of over $3,000 in the executive branches of the work, and a saving, all things considered, of over $7,000 per annum.

Until the year 1849 the Commissioner of Public Buildings was under the supervision and control of the President of the United States. It had then become manifest that amidst his numerous legitimate cares of State it was impossible for the President to exercise that proper and necessary supervision over the acts, expenditures, &c., of the Commissioner of Public Buildings as was called for by the theory and practice of our Government toward all disbursing officers and agents, and by the ninth section of the act of the 3d March, 1849, creating this Department, that officer was placed under the control of the Secretary of the Interior by the enactment in the following words:

"Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the supervisory and appellate powers now exercised by the President of the United States over the Commissioner of Public Buildings shall be exercised by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall sign all requisitions for the advance or payment of money out of the Treasury, on estimates or accounts, subject to the same adjustment or control now exercised on similar estimates or accounts by the First Auditor and First Comptroller of the Treasury: Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed to take from the Presiding Officers of the two Houses of Congress the power now possessed by them to make and enforce rules and regulations for the care, preservation, orderly keeping, and police of the Capitol, and its appurtenances." (See volume 9 Statutes, p. 396.)

Until the year 1854, the Commissioner of Public Buildings transmitted his estimates and made his annual reports to Congress direct. But in that year, and while the present incumbent held that office, Congress saw fit to enact the fifteenth section of the appropriation act of August 4, 1854, which is in these words:

"Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the warden of the penitentiary of the United States for the District of Columbia and the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds shall make to the Secretary of the Interior annually, in time to accompany the annual message of the President to Congress, report of their operations for the preceding year, and of the manner in which all appropriations have been applied respectively; and that all estimates of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds shall hereafter be approved and submitted by the Secretary of the Interior annually, through the Treasury Department, as other estimates, to the two Houses of Congress. And further, that all appropriations which are herein made, or may be hereafter made, for repairs or improvements of the public buildings, grounds, and streets within the District of Columbia, and now under the charge of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; and that all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this section shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed." (See volume 10 United States Statutes at Large, pages 573, 574, 575.)

On the 16th of April, 1862, Congress enacted a joint resolution in the following words:

"Resolved, * * * * * That the supervision of the Capitol extension and the erection of the new dome, be, and the same is hereby, transferred from the War Department to the Department of the Interior, and all unexpended money which has been heretofore appropriated, and all money which may be hereafter appropriated, for either of the improvements heretofore mentioned, shall be expended under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That no money heretofore appropriated shall be expended upon the Capitol until authorized by Congress, except so much as is necessary to protect the building from injury by the elements, and to complete the dome." (See volume 12, page 617, Statutes at Large.)

Senate bill No. 43 proposes to repeal all this and other legislation, and to place the Capitol extension and new dome and Patent Office building, and all appropriations that may hereafter be made for public buildings and grounds belonging to the United States, in the city of Washington, under the control of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, who is to draw all his requisitions upon the Treasury direct, and to place his office under the supervision and control of the President of the United States. If, now, the President, with his multiplied cares and responsibilities, can now exercise that supervision and control over the acts and doings of the Commissioner of Public Buildings which he could not do prior to the year 1854, it is difficult to perceive; nor is it apparent from any public considerations, why the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds should now be released from the customary restraints and supervision which Congress deemed it expedient and necessary by special enactment to place over it in that year.

I beg to assure you that this communication is not prompted by any desire on my part to retain control over, or official connection with, these public works or the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds; but simply to repel by a simple statement of facts the implied censure of my official action in reference to them. That Mr. French, the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, was annoyed at my relieving him of the duty of disbursing the appropriation for the Capitol extension and new dome, I am aware; but he had ceased to be legally entitled to receive any compensation therefor, and I knew that the ordinary duties of his office, if properly performed, were sufficiently onerous to demand all his time and attention. It never occurred to me that he would complain of being relieved from a fiduciary trust which yielded him no emoluments, but only increased his labors and responsibilities; and, even if it had, I should not have been thereby deterred from making a change which I deemed to be called for by the best interests of the Government.

It is, of course, quite immaterial to me whether the supervision and control over the acts and expenditures of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds remain with this Department or not, but that the public interests require that such supervision and control should be exercised by the President or the head of some one of the Executive Departments, my experience places beyond a doubt; and that it is wholly impossible for the President to exercise it must, I think, be manifest. I beg to disclaim any purpose of dictating as to what legislation is proper or necessary on the subject, but am confident that a full inquiry into all the facts will show conclusively that the supervision I have exercised over his official acts, has resulted beneficially to the public.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. P. USHER,
Secretary.

Hon. SOLOMON FOOT, U. S. Senate, Chairman of Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I think that before the bill passes that letter should be printed and read by Senators. I should like to read it. I will move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Monday, and that the letter of the Secretary be printed.

Mr. FOOT. I hope, sir, it will not be postponed for the third time. The Senators from Indiana will bear me witness that I have exhibited every courtesy and indulgence that could be reasonably asked, and it has been delayed on that account. I desired to meet their wish and their convenience on this question, and hence it has been delayed to this time after having been upon the Calendar four months, twice taken up and partially considered, and superseded by the special order of the day. A postponement now would be equivalent to a defeat of the bill, and I should abandon all hope of getting it up again. This letter was addressed to myself as chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, was read in committee, was delivered to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE,] and he has had it in his possession from that time to this. It has been read in the hearing of the Senate, and will be published of course in the debates of the body as part of the speech or connected with the speech of the Senator who introduced it, the Senator from Indiana. I hope the bill will not be postponed.

If there are no further remarks to be made by Senators in opposition to the bill, I will occupy, with the indulgence of the Senate, a very brief time in a general exposition again of the character of the bill.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have no objection to withdraw my motion until the Senator makes his speech.

Mr. FOOT. I had hoped, however, to hear all that was to be said in opposition to it before I should be called upon to reply.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have no speech to make. I am opposed to the passage of the bill, and I should like to have the privilege of reading that letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn, and the Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FOOT. I will ask the indulgence of the Senate, Mr. President, for a short time, while I may reply, as briefly as I may, to some points of objection which have been urged against the passage of this bill, both by the Secretary of the Interior, in the letter which has been read in our hearing, and by one or two members of the body who have addressed the Senate in opposition to it, so far at least as to correct some errors of fact into which they have fallen, inadvertently, no doubt, and to remove, if possible, a strange misapprehension in respect to the purport and object and effect of the bill under consideration.

It has been made an objection to the passage of this bill, in the first place, that its passage will carry with it a sort of implied censure or rebuke of the action of the Secretary of the Interior. I remember that my honorable friend, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] very emphatically asked, "Why rebuke the Secretary of the Interior?" The simple answer to that inquiry is, that nobody proposes or has proposed or thought of proposing to rebuke the Secretary of the Interior. Nothing of the kind is intended. Nothing of the kind can fairly be inferred from the bill itself. Nothing of the kind, I undertake to say, can be reasonably extorted from the character and nature of the bill; and the Senator will allow me to say, in all kindness, that I cannot regard it as quite generous on his part to attempt to place me, or the committee which I represent here, in an attitude of apparent or seeming antagonism to the Secretary of the Interior, a gentleman for whose integrity of character I have a high respect, and in the honesty of whose motives I have entire confidence.

This is but an ordinary act of legislation, a mere matter-of-fact business legislation, and not one of unusual character by any means. But two years ago the joint resolution to which the Secretary refers in his letter, introduced by myself and passed both branches of Congress, transferred the supervision of these works from the War Department to the Department of the Interior. Was that act regarded by anybody as carrying with it an implied censure of the Secretary of War? Sir, the idea was never thought of, much less was it urged as an argument or a reason against the transfer.

But besides, Mr. President, this bill, as amended by recommendation of the committee and concurred in by the Senate, does not at all take from nor in the slightest degree restrict the appellate and supervising power and direction of the Secretary of the Interior over the official acts of the Commissioner of Public Buildings. It simply assigns to the Commissioner of Public Buildings the general personal superintendence of those works instead of having it assigned, as now, to a mere agent, a new or additional officer created by the Secretary of the Interior to act as his agent in this matter.

The office of Commissioner of Public Buildings is itself a part or branch of the Department of the Interior, and all its acts are subject to the general supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior. It stands upon the same footing in relation to that Department as does the office of Commissioner of Patents, or of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or of the Commissioner of Pensions, or of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, all of whose acts are subject to the official supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior.

This bill does not remove from the Secretary of the Interior any appellate and supervisory control over the acts of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, as conferred upon him by the general act of 1849, establishing a Home Department, or Department of the Interior, as it is called, by combining all these several offices under one general head or Department. These are, indeed, but different parts or branches of the Department of the Interior, and constitute that Department. The bill, therefore, so far from removing the general supervision of these works from the control and direction of the Department of the Interior, simply assigns it to a member of that Department, to the head of a branch or bureau of that Department, and whose official acts are at all times subject to the appellate and supervisory power of the Secretary of the Interior. This objection is therefore obviated by the bill as amended upon the recommendation of the committee.

It is also said, rather by way of excuse or apology for the appointment of this general superintendent than as an argument or reason for having originally made it, and much less for its present continuance, that the appointment was made by the request and upon the recommendation of the architect and the Commissioner, Mr. Walter and Mr. French. What if it were so? Does that preclude all action of Congress in the matter? May we not inquire into and determine for ourselves, nevertheless, whether this appointment was demanded or called for by any considerations of public interest or of public advantage as connected with these works? Most assuredly we may.

But, Mr. President, what is the fact relative to these gentlemen having recommended this appointment? They never recommended or asked for the appointment of the present superintendent. The letter alluded to has been read, or, if not read, its substance was stated by the honorable Senator from Indiana when he was upon the floor on this question some time ago, and it was this: in August, 1862, as will appear from the date of that letter, these gentlemen addressed a note to the then Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Caleb B. Smith, advising the appointment, of whom? Not the present superintendent, but advising the appointment of Mr. Edward Clark, then the architect of the Patent Office building, and a gentleman of acknowledged high personal and professional character. Mr. Smith, however, did not see fit to make the appointment; probably for the reason either that he had not, in his own judgment, the authority to make such an appointment, or that, if he had, there was no necessity and no occasion for the creation of such an agency or superintendency. Either reason was abundantly sufficient. Certainly if there was no authority for it in 1862 when Mr. Smith declined to make the appointment, there was none in 1863, when the appointment was made by his successor. If there was no necessity and no occasion for such an appointment in 1862, when Mr. Secretary Smith declined to make it, there was certainly none in 1863, when the work had advanced still further toward the point of completion, when the work was confined to a comparatively small portion of the building, and the force formerly employed upon it had been greatly reduced.

But, sir, the practical question recurs, is there any necessity, is there any occasion for the appointment of a general superintendent of this work aside from and in addition to that general supervision and oversight which the architect, by virtue of his office, and which the Commissioner of Public Buildings, by virtue of his office, would exercise? If there is, and if there be authority on the part of the Secretary of the Interior to make such an appointment, and if economy and efficiency in the prosecution of these works require this agency, let it stand; otherwise, let it be discontinued, and this item of four or five thousand dollars for salaries be saved to the Government.

Again, it is urged as an objection to the passage of this bill and to the discontinuing of this office of general superintendent, that economy and efficiency in the prosecution of the work have been secured by it. That is a legitimate argument if it can be sustained by the facts. That is really the practical question and the only practical question before us in the consideration of this bill. Now, how is that fact? Is it so? Is it true that a greater economy and a greater efficiency in the prosecution of these works have been secured by the appointment of this superintendent, who commenced the duties of that office now nearly a year ago, the 1st of July, 1863? The Secretary of the Interior says so; but upon what authority does he say it? Not from his own personal knowledge, not from his own personal observation of the progress of these works from year to year and from month to month and from day to day; but he makes that statement solely upon the authority of the statement of his superintendent, the person of all others most directly and deeply interested in this very question now pending before us—interested, indeed, to magnify the importance of the office which he holds, and above all to magnify the importance and the value of his own services. And what evidence does he adduce to you to show that under his administration there has been a greater economy and efficiency in the prosecution of these works than before? Undoubtedly he would present the best case for himself that the facts and circumstances would admit of; and it is simply this: he makes an exhibit in parallel columns of the quarterly disbursements for the Capitol extension for the six months immediately preceding his appointment, that is, from the 1st of January to the 1st of July, 1863, and of the aggregate quarterly disbursements for the six months immediately succeeding his appointment, and comparing the two, he shows in that way an excess of between eighteen and nineteen thousand dollars of expenditure during the first six months of his administration over that of the preceding six months; and in the meanwhile that he had paid some two thousand three hundred dollars more than had been paid the preceding six months for mechanical and other labor; thus showing, as he says—and I will read his own words, for I have a copy of his letter addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, I think sometime in the month of January past and immediately after the introduction of this bill into the Senate—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. FOOT. I ask the indulgence of the Senate, and especially of my friend from Michigan, to postpone the special order for the time being, until, at any rate, I conclude my remarks.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall be happy to extend any courtesy to my friend from Vermont, but I suppose he will be able to assure the Senate that he will not occupy much further time on this question.

Mr. FOOT. I will not occupy much time. I never do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the special order will be temporarily laid aside, and the Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. FOOT. After making this exhibit and showing how much more had been expended in the same length of time under his administration than had been expended during the same period immediately preceding his appointment, he says this shows "an increase of expense and activity in these branches."

And the Senator from Indiana, upon this exhibit that the present superintendent had expended eighteen or nineteen thousand dollars during the last six months of the last year more than had been expended during the preceding six months, exclaimed, "Why supersede the present superintendent when he shows you that he has expended $18,000 in six months more than had been expended the six months preceding, thus showing that he had done just so much more work on this building?" I admit, Mr. President, that the superintendent very clearly shows an "increase of expenditure" from the appropriations for these buildings during his administration; but it does not appear quite so clear to my mind how it shows an increased efficiency, or "activity," as he calls it, in the prosecution of these works. That discovery must be left to those whose keener optics will enable them to discover what is not apparent to ordinary observation. And yet the Secretary of the Interior is pleased to accept this inference which the superintendent draws from this exhibit, inconclusive and illogical as it is, as evidence of the fact; that is, as evidence of an increased facility and energy and vigor in the prosecution of these works. It proves no such thing. The grand result, comparing the amount of expenditure for a given time with the progress of the work for the same length of time, shows entirely the contrary.

Near the close of the last session of Congress the House of Representatives, in their miscellaneous appropriation bill, among other items, provided for an appropriation of $500,000 for the continuation of the Capitol extension, and the bill came from the House of Representatives with that item of appropriation. The Committee on Public Buildings, upon consultation, thought it advisable that the work for the coming season should be confined to the eastern front of the Capitol; that is, to the north and south wings, to the porticos, the flights of steps at each wing, and the flagging in front of the corridors; in short, that it should be confined to the completion of the work on the eastern side of the Capitol, and to reduce the House appropriation to such sum as would be necessary for the completion of that portion of the work. The Committee on Finance entertained the same view upon this subject. With these views, my colleague, then a member of the Committee on Finance, and for that committee, with myself for the Committee on Public Buildings, called upon Mr. Walter, the architect, and requested him to make an estimate of the cost for the completion of the work on the eastern front of the north and south wings of the Capitol, and to give us his judgment as to the length of time that would be required to complete it. Mr. Walter informed us that in his judgment that work could be completed in nine months, or by the 1st of December following, or by the next meeting of Congress, which was the same thing. He made his estimate of the amount necessary to complete that work, and placed a copy of that estimate in the hands of my colleague, a member of the Committee on Finance, and that estimate was before that committee. They recommended a reduction of the appropriation of the House of Representatives from $500,000 to $150,000 for that purpose, that being the estimate made by Mr. Walter as amply sufficient, with the appropriation yet unexpended and on hand of $184,000, making in all $334,000, on the 1st of March a year ago, for the completion of the work on the eastern side of the north and south extensions. The appropriation of the House of Representatives was reduced in the Senate to that sum—$150,000—leaving $334,000 in hand for the purpose of completing these portions of the work, including in the estimate the cost for the "bronze door," of about thirty thousand dollars.

How did we find it on coming here on the 1st of December last at the time when, according to the estimate of Mr. Walter, the work was to have been completed; and according to the estimate of Mr. Walter, it should have been completed within the appropriation made for it expressly upon his estimate? We found the work about half done, not more. Six months have passed since, and it is far from complete yet, as you all see. But that was not the worst of it. The work was not only merely half completed, but the entire appropriation of $334,000 was completely exhausted, and we have since appropriated $150,000 to supply the deficiency. There is evidence for you of "increased activity" in the expenditure of the public money; but tell me, where is the evidence of increased "activity" and efficiency in the prosecution of the work? Six months more have passed, and six months more in addition, I now venture to say, will still pass and the work will be unfinished, still behindhand, a large deficit again to be supplied, and another appropriation asked for to complete it, notwithstanding we have already in the early part of this session appropriated $150,000 for this deficiency. There may have been abundant and unavoidable cause for delay in the prosecution of the work; but that does not answer the question. I am answering the fallacious and absurd assumption that the amount of expenditure in a given time is to be taken as the measure and the evidence of the amount of work actually performed in that time. A most preposterous pretension, indeed, to be presented for the acceptance of men of practical common sense!

Again, great merit is claimed for the superintendent in reducing the executive or administrative force upon the work, and thus reducing in proportion the expenditure of Government for this class of employes. How was that? Not of his own accord, not of his own motion, but by instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, he recommended the discharge of some three or four overseers or foremen of different branches of the work, and I think some half dozen watchmen. They were discharged, and there was a corresponding reduction of cost to the Government for those employes; and if he had only dismissed them all while his hand was in, there would have been a still greater reduction of cost to the Government for these employes, provided that none others had been appointed in their place. But the question that naturally arises is this: if there was reason to suppose that this executive force was too large, larger than necessary, that it was costing the Government too much, that a due regard to economy required its reduction, could not that have all been inquired into and ascertained and the proper reductions made by the Secretary of the Interior upon consultation and coöperation with the architect of the building, who knew more about it than any other man, who had been the superintending architect of the building from the beginning? Upon consultation and coöperation with him, could not these facts have all been ascertained, and the proper reductions made, without the appointment and employment of a general superintendent at so large a salary? I am not complaining of the changes that were made. These may all have been well enough. I am only wondering that the Secretary of the Interior in his laudable efforts, which I doubt not were sincere, and in his anxiety to reduce the expenses of the Government as far as possible in this regard, should have found it necessary to employ an agent at so heavy a cost to assist him in carrying out his work of reform in the way of economy; in other words, that he should have deemed it necessary to appoint an additional employe at an unusually high compensation in order to help him find out whether there were not already too many of these employes on the work!

Mr. President, the main object and purpose of the bill now upon your table is to supersede, to discontinue this office or agency of general superintendent, as unnecessary, as utterly useless, and even worse than useless, and as involving an unnecessary expenditure. I have no hesitation in saying that its discontinuance is demanded by considerations of public interest; that it is demanded by considerations both of economy and of energy and efficiency in the prosecution of these works; and in this opinion I have the concurrence of the committee who have examined the subject, whose business and whose duty it was to examine the subject and to recommend such measure, such modification, or such change as in their judgment the public interest demanded. We have simply tried faithfully to perform that duty.

I can say for myself, and I am sure I can say for every member of the committee, that in this we have been influenced by no considerations of a mere personal character either of prejudice or of favoritism toward anybody. The present superintendent is personally a stranger to me, as I presume he is to most if not to all the members of this body. I have no prejudices against him. I have no personal knowledge of the man; I would do him no injustice; I would not speak harshly or unkindly of him. But from all the information I have in relation to him, I infer that he is a young man of fair qualifications to discharge acceptably the duties of an office clerk; that he is a very good, even an expert penman, and he is said to be a very good draughtsman; but I infer also that he has not the experience, that he has not the habits of industry, the application to business, in short, that he has not those qualifications which are requisite for the duties of a general superintendent of these important and costly works. At all events, if I am correctly informed in that regard, and I believe I am, he devotes little or no time to the personal supervision and superintendence of these works. If I am correctly informed, he has hardly spent a day or an hour on or about these works since his appointment in the way of personal direction and superintendence. For aught I know, he may have been well and profitably employed otherwise in the service of the Government; I do not undertake to say how that is; but I say he does not give to the Government the benefit of his personal attention to these works. I can say that I have never seen him on or about these works myself, and I have not been altogether an inattentive observer of their progress; and when I have inquired about it, I have been uniformly told that he rarely if ever makes his personal appearance there, either to give any direction or order in relation to the work or to see how it has been done. In fact, the question has been asked me, a question which, though quaint in phrase, carries with it great significance, and carries with it its own answer:

"What is the use of having a general superintendent of these works unless he superintends something?" I confess I do not see.

But, Mr. President, not to consume the time of the Senate in further discussion upon this subject, I have only to repeat that we ask and urge the passage of this bill with a view and for the purpose of relieving the Government of this unnecessary and useless agency and its attendant cost of four or five thousand dollars per annum; not a very large amount, to be sure, but nevertheless not unworthy of our consideration in these times of enormous and rapidly accumulating national debt and public taxation—debt and taxation rendered necessary for the support of the Government, and for the maintenance of its honor, its faith, and its integrity.

I will say further, Mr. President, that upon the action of Congress on this bill, in my judgment, depends, in no small degree, the question whether these works shall be completed within any reasonable length of time, or within any reasonable limit of expenditure. In conclusion I will add, if the present superintendent must be retained in the public service, if he must have employment under the Government—and that seems to be the issue in a great measure—if he must be the recipient of public patronage, I pray you let it be in some other capacity, let it be in some other position than that of general superintendent of these Government works.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the order of the day.

Mr. CONNESS. Can we not have a vote on this measure?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Not now.

J. H. CLARK AND COMPANY.

Mr. POMEROY. Yesterday morning I made a report from the Committee on Claims upon the joint resolution of the House of Representatives to refer the claim of J. H. Clark & Co. to the Court of Claims, and I asked the Senate to pass the joint resolution at once. It was, however, laid over at the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] because he desired to know what the nature of the claim was. I can now explain it to him. It is simply a claim growing out of a contract with the quartermaster's department for furnishing supplies at Cincinnati. They delivered the supplies in part and claim pay for the whole, I believe. It should under the law have gone to the Court of Claims without being considered in the House of Representatives; but after the House took possession of the claim and saw its character, they proposed that it should be referred to the Court of Claims, and passed this joint resolution to that effect.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the reference, that being the character of the claim.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 74) referring the claim of J. H. Clark & Co. to the Court of Claims was considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 132) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the substitute of the committee by striking out in line one hundred and three of the third section on the 14th page the word "three" and inserting "ten," so as to read, "in case no claimant shall appear within ten years from the time of the opening of said road across any land, all claim to damages against said company shall be barred."

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The subject was considered very fully and amply by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and they came to the conclusion that three years would be a reasonable time to allow persons owning unoccupied lands to make their appearance and present their claim.

Mr. HARLAN. I believe that in no State in the Union is there such a statute of limitations as this, giving a party who has quiet possession for three years an absolute title to the premises; and especially in times like these, it seems to me that it would be improper to reduce the limitation all along the line of this road to so brief a period. This may be a very important proposition when we come to apply it to property in the vicinity or within the limits of Sacramento and San Francisco cities. Immense possessions may be passed in this way from the real owner, without one time of compensation, to this corporation. It seems to me that it would be grossly wrong to permit such a thing to take place, especially when there are so many men in the Army and Navy of the United States who have enlisted for the period of three years and are not enabled to return to their homes to take care of their private interests.

Mr. HOWARD. This clause applies only to the route of the Pacific railroad from the one hundredth degree of west longitude to the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada, and does not apply to any case arising within the limits of the State of California or any other State. I understood the Senator from Iowa to express the idea that it would apply in a State. It does not.

Mr. HARLAN. In the clauses of the bill authorizing other corporations to build roads, all the rights, privileges, and immunities conferred on the Union Pacific Railroad Company are conferred on each of the other corporations, so that if this is an immunity or privilege conferred on the Union Pacific Railroad Company, by the provisions of the bill pertaining to the other corporations it would alike pertain to them.

Mr. HOWARD. It is impossible for the Congress of the United States to give to a State corporation any right, or faculty, or immunity that it does not possess under its charter, without the consent of the State granting the charter; and it was not the purpose of the committee, nor is it the meaning of this expression, that it shall be applied to State charters—charters granted by the State of California or any other State. The purpose was to secure to the Union Pacific Railroad Company a quiet and peaceful title to lands which it may occupy and which shall not be claimed by the non-resident owner for three years after the company has gone into the actual occupancy and possession of the land. Of course cases must arise, where the lands are unoccupied, where their owners may not be known, in which it is absolutely necessary, in order to push forward the work, to occupy the lands and build the road and sometimes perhaps in the ignorance of the owner. In such cases, I submit that the owner of the land cannot be very seriously injured if we give him three years' time, after his land has thus been taken and used by the company, to make his claim; and that is the sole effect of the clause. What are we to do? Is the company to remain for ten years with the title to its land uncertain, insecure, the owner of the land unknown? Such would be the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa if it should be adopted by the Senate. I trust that this clause may remain as the committee have reported it. The committee were unanimous upon this identical clause, and the Senator from Iowa was present, if my recollection serves me, when it was taken up for consideration by the committee and was passed upon by them.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator is manifestly in error in the conclusion that he draws. On page 13 the following provision will be found: "And in case it shall be necessary for the company to enter upon lands which are unoccupied, and of which there is no apparent owner or claimant, it may proceed to take and use the same for the purpose of said railroad, and may institute proceedings in manner described for the purpose of ascertaining the value of and acquiring a title to the same;" so that if no owner should appear, the company themselves may appear in court and require that the land shall be appraised and condemned, and appropriated to their use at its appraised value; but this additional clause on the following page, which I move to strike out, will enable them to take the land without payment after having quiet possession for three years. It seems to me that this provision is unnecessary. The company may proceed and occupy the land and have it condemned and pay over to the clerk of the court its appraised value and hold it, if they choose; and if they neglect to do this, the clause that I propose to strike out would enable them to acquire title without payment if the real owner should fail to appear within three years.

The Senator says this is not intended to apply to any of the States; but this road may pass through the city of Denver, which has now grown to be a populous city, with millions of dollars' worth of town property; independent of that, it will pass through the country where there are hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of lands that are rapidly going into the hands of private owners, hundreds and thousands of whom may be in the armies of the United States or serving in its navies, and who are unable to appear and protect their own rights.

Mr. HOWARD. I am not ignorant of the effect of the clause, as the Senator seems to imagine. Let me read it as it stands in the bill, and then the Senate will understand it clearly:

And in case it shall be necessary for the company to enter upon lands which are unoccupied, and of which there is no apparent owner or claimant, it may proceed to take and use the same for the purpose of said railroad, and may institute proceedings in manner described for the purpose of ascertaining the value of and acquiring a title to the same; but the judge shall determine the kind of notice to be given such owner or owners, and he may in his discretion appoint an agent or guardian to represent such owner or owners in case of his or their incapacity or non-appearance.

Where there is no appearance the judge has authority to appoint a guardian or an agent to appear in court and act for the absentee, and thus protect all his rights; but the clause proceeds:

In case no claimant shall appear within three years from the time of the opening of said road across any land, all claim to damages against said company shall be barred.

He is allowed three years after the land shall have been actually taken and used by the company to appear and make his claim for compensation as against the company. If at the end of that time he does not appear, and the land has thus been occupied by the company, it seems to me it is not unjust to bar all his claim for compensation.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. The provision to which the Senator refers authorizes the company to have the damages assessed by an application to the court, and the judge is to designate what notice shall be served.

Mr. HOWARD. It depends on the direction of the judge.

Mr. MORRILL. I say that is your provision. You authorize the company to have the land condemned and appraised—the court determining what notice shall be given to the supposed owner. Is it imperative on the company to do that?

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose so.

Mr. MORRILL. But if the company do not do it do they not still get title to the land at the end of three years under the provision as it stands?

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose there must be notice in every case where there is a private ownership of land.

Mr. MORRILL. It seems to me that that is the difficulty with this section, that it contemplates in the provision read that a company may do that, may secure a title to lands of a non-resident and non-occupant, where the owner is not known, by appealing to the judge; but suppose the company do not find an occupant and still take and possess the land for three whole years, is not the owner, by their occupation for three years, absolutely excluded from making any further application?

Mr. HOWARD. I think the question of the Senator is sufficiently answered by the clause itself which I have read, which says that—

In case it shall be necessary for the company to enter upon lands which are unoccupied, and of which there is no apparent owner or claimant, it may proceed to take and use the same for the purpose of said railroad, and may institute proceedings in manner described for the purpose of ascertaining the value of and acquiring a title to the same; but the judge shall determine the kind of notice, &c.

I take it the implication is irresistible that the notice must at all events be given, and that you cannot take even unoccupied land of the owner without this notice.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I suggest, to make it entirely clear, that the Senator accept an amendment which I will propose in the last clause, to insert the words "so taken and condemned," so as to make it read:

In case no claimant shall appear within three years from the time of the opening of said road across any land so taken and condemned, all claim to damages against said company shall be barred.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly; I have no objection to that. That is the idea.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is an amendment to an amendment, and therefore is not amendable.

Mr. HARLAN. I take great pleasure in withdrawing my amendment to enable the amendment of the Senator from Maine to be presented. I suppose it will effect the same object.

Mr. MORRILL. I was not aware that there was any amendment pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is withdrawn.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, to insert after the word "land," in line one hundred and four of section three, the words "so taken and condemned."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend in the fourth section by striking out the words "future use and," in the tenth line, and inserting after the word "road" of that line "until the said road shall be completed, unless the said lands may be reserved, or otherwise disposed of or settled upon under the laws of the United States at an earlier period."

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Iowa state what particular evil he discovers in the bill which is to be remedied by this amendment? I confess I do not see the need of it myself. I think all these cases are otherwise provided for in other provisions of the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. The section as it now stands provides:

That in addition to the right and authority granted to the said company in said original act to take from the public lands adjoining said road stone, timber, and other materials, for the construction of the road, said company is hereby authorized and empowered to take and use any coal or iron ores lying within any of the public lands upon the general route of the proposed road, and within the limits of ten miles on each side of the line thereof, and which may be made available either in the construction or future use and operation of said road.

It seems to me that this might be construed to convey to them a title to the iron and coal on all the public lands within the limits stated, of ten miles on each side of the road, which I suppose is not the intention of the committee. If the amendment I propose shall prevail, it will enable them to take and use the coal and iron until the land shall pass from the possession of the Government of the United States in the ordinary way to private holders, and no longer.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to striking out the words "future use and" in the tenth line, for I do not perceive that it would change the sense of the clause to strike them out; but I regard the other portion of the amendment, which consists of an insertion of certain words after the word "road" in that same line, as superfluous entirely. No such danger need be guarded against, because the very terms of this section show that the company is not to be considered the owner of these coal and iron lands, the language of the section being:

And in case said company is desirous of becoming purchasers of the fee of such lands containing coal and iron ores, patents therefor shall be issued to said company by the Government of the United States, at the price at which Government lands without minerals are sold at the time such patents issue.

Plainly enough showing that the only effect of the previous clause is to allow to the company as a mere bonus, as a mere gratification, the right to go and get iron and coal for the purpose of making their road with it and operating the road after it is made.

Mr. HARLAN. I will accept the modification suggested by the Senator.

Mr. HOWARD. I consent to strike out "future use and," but I object to the insertion of the other words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as now modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend in section four, line fourteen, by inserting after the word "which" the word "such," and by striking out at the end of that line and the commencement of line fifteen the words "without minerals," so as to read, "at the price at which such Government lands are sold at the time such patents issue."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to insert, in line fifteen of section five, these words at the end of the line, "granted to said company."

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me that that makes a limitation that destroys the effect of the provision if I understand it. The bill as it now reads provides:

That within two years after the passage of this act the said company shall designate such general route of said road, as near as may be, and shall file a map of the same in the Department of the Interior; whereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the lands within fifteen miles of such designated route to be withdrawn from preemption, private entry, or sale.

The Senator from Iowa moves to insert the words "granted to said company," so as to read, "whereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the lands granted to said company within fifteen miles of such designated route to be withdrawn," &c. There is no use in withdrawing them from the market; if they are granted to the company, of course they are not in the market.

Mr. HOWARD. The sole object of withdrawal is to ascertain what lands will be granted to the company. The whole mass of the lands lying on each side of the line of the road for a certain distance are to be withheld from sale or preemption for the very purpose of making the selection of the proper alternate sections.

Mr. HARLAN. There is no selection of alternate sections to be made. The bill itself provides that the odd sections and parts thereof shall be granted, and it does not grant an acre of an even section. The text of the bill, as it stands, would require the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from sale not only the odd sections which are provisionally granted, but also to withdraw from sale, preemption, and settlement, all the even sections; and as there are public lands lying along the line of these branch roads where the lands have been surveyed and been in market for a series of years, as well as in the unsurveyed Territories, it seems to me the Senate will perceive that it would work great inconvenience to these settlements to prohibit persons from settling on the even sections of land which this bill does not propose to grant to any of these companies. If my amendment shall be adopted, it will require the Secretary to withdraw from sale, preemption, and settlement, the odd sections within the limits indicated, and the even sections will be subject to sale, preemption, and settlement.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose the object of withdrawing these lands from sale is evident. The bill provides that in case the odd sections which are proposed to be granted to the company shall have been previously appropriated, previously entered or preempted, or belong to some other person than the Government, the company is to be authorized to select in lieu of the sections which it cannot obtain other sections within fifteen miles of the road; and I suppose the object of withdrawing the land is to afford an opportunity to go outside to the extent of thirty miles, fifteen on each side of the road, for the purpose of selecting lands to make up the quantity that is intended to be granted by the bill, to make up the full complement.

Now, if you simply provide, as I said before, to withdraw from preemption and sale the lands that are granted to the company, you do not provide anything, and you had better strike out the whole of it. There is no need of such a clause as that. The lands granted to the company are by the grant withdrawn from preemption, sale, or private entry. Nobody else can enter them, or settle upon them, or meddle with them after they have been granted to the company. It would require a change of the whole section, I think, to carry out the Senator's idea. This is a temporary provision, as I understand it—I do not remember now how long it extends—to withdraw from the market, when the company shall have located the road, all the lands within fifteen miles of it, to give them an opportunity, not to select the odd section, as the Senator from Iowa very properly remarks, within ten miles of the road, because the law determines that, and it requires no selection; but in case that an odd section has been appropriated to other purposes, and the company cannot therefore have the benefit of it, the intention, I suppose, is to give them an opportunity within this limit to make the selection, and then the lands will come into market again.

Mr. HARLAN. With the consent of the Senate, I will modify my amendment, so as to insert the words "odd sections of" before the words "the lands," in line fifteen of section five. The clause will then read:

Whereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the odd sections of the lands within fifteen miles of such designated route to be withdrawn from preemption, &c.

Mr. CONNESS. Does the Senator withdraw his other amendment?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir, and offer this in lieu of it.

The chairman of the committee laughs at my suggestion. Sir, there are some things that I know as well as he does, and this is one of them. I know that he is not right and that I am. The bill grants the odd sections of land within the limits of ten miles on each side of the road, and if these odd sections or parts of them have been sold by the Government or preempted, or homestead settlers have settled on them, or if they have been reserved or granted for other purposes, the company may go outside of the ten mile limit, within fifteen miles, and select lands to make up for the deficiency thus occasioned. The object I have in view is, that the Secretary of the Interior shall withdraw from sale the odd sections of land not only within the limits of ten miles which are granted, but the odd sections without the limit of ten miles and within fifteen miles; though that ought to be twenty miles, for in another provision they are authorized to go within the limits of twenty miles, while the text of the bill here says fifteen miles. I intended to offer an amendment to strike out "fifteen" in this clause and insert "twenty," so as to make the provisions of the amendment on this subject congruous throughout. The object I have is that the Secretary shall withdraw from sale the odd sections of land within twenty miles on each side of the road, so as to enable the companies to go outside of the ten mile limit and within the limit of twenty miles to make up the deficiency of land in lieu of those that may have been otherwise disposed of by the Federal Government before the company may have filed the plat of the surveyed route of the road.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. HOWARD. I said expressly that I should accept the amendment as modified by the Senator from Iowa, and I supposed it had passed the body. The Senator seems to complain that I laughed at him. I am not conscious of having laughed or smiled at the honorable Senator from Iowa. He is certainly under an entire misapprehension in that regard.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa whether the language of the amendment would not be more consonant with the language of the bill if he were to say "designated by odd numbers." It will then read:

Whereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the lands designated by odd numbers within fifteen miles of such designated route to be withdrawn from preemption, private entry, or sale.

That is the language used in the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to that modification if the Senator prefers it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I think it would now be necessary in that clause to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty."

Mr. HARLAN. It would be; and I have marked such an amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. In section five, line sixteen, I move to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" in line twenty-one of the same section to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" and in line thirty-one of the same section to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty." That will make the section in harmony with the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In section five, line seventeen, I move to insert the words "homestead settlement" after the word "preemption," so that the clause will read:

Whereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the lands designated by odd numbers within twenty miles of such designated route to be withdrawn from preemption, homestead settlement, private entry, or sale.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to that. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa whether in the twentieth line of the fifth section, after the word "lands," the same words ought not to be inserted as were inserted after the word "lands" in the fifteenth line, "designated by odd numbers?"

Mr. HARLAN. I think it would be necessary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that amendment. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In section five, line twenty-three, I move to strike out the word "hereinbefore" and to insert "herein."

Mr. HOWARD. What is the reason for that change?

Mr. HARLAN. The word "hereinbefore," as I suppose, would refer to the grants made in the first part of the bill preceding that word. In the succeeding parts of the bill there are grants made conditionally to other corporations through different parts of the country, and I suppose that that word might be construed, so as to limit the grant to this one company alone.

Mr. HOWARD. It seems to me that the Senator's criticism is entirely hypercritical, for every possible case and contingency that can arise in relation to these other companies is provided for in plain terms in this substitute which has been reported by the committee; so that, in my judgment, it is impossible that any such difficulty as the Senator seems to apprehend could arise in the operation of the bill. Nevertheless, I am willing to yield to him and allow the amendment to be made in order to remove any doubt that may hang upon his own mind in relation to this subject, for I wish to get through with the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In section five, line thirty-two, after the word "road," I move to insert the following words:

But this clause shall not be so construed as to impair the vested rights of settlers, preceptors, or purchasers at the date of the publication of said change at the proper land offices, to be made by the registers thereof, under the direction of the President of the United States.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands what effect that amendment would have upon that portion of the route where the lands were withdrawn from market last year under the old bill of 1862? If this measure goes into effect from and after its passage, would it not make valid all the claims of the settlers that have entered on those lands during the past year?

Mr. HARLAN. I think not. It was not my intention to affect them. The bill first provides in this section that a plat of the road shall be filed within two years in the Department of the Interior, and afterwards the odd sections of land within certain limits shall be withdrawn from market. It then provides that the companies may relocate their line, and, as it seemed to me, the phraseology of the bill would enable the companies to undermine the persons who might have settled on the public lands outside of these limits by a change of the line of their road to the right or to the left. The language is this:

And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the said lands herein granted to be surveyed and set apart as may be necessary for the purposes herein named whenever any portion of said line of road shall be finally located.

Now comes the clause:

And said company are authorized to modify and change the location of any portion or portions of its line, with the approval of the President of the United States, and thereupon the provisions herein mentioned as to withdrawal, survey, and setting apart of said lands shall be deemed to refer and apply to the land within twenty miles of such changed location of the road.

So that if a party should settle on lands outside of the twenty mile limits, and these companies were to change the location of the road, two, three, or five years afterwards so as to bring those lands within the limits of the twenty miles, the effect of this clause would be to oust him from his possessions.

Mr. HOWARD. I think that would be impossible under the bill itself; it would not be the effect, as I suppose. I apprehend no such consequence could follow; but still, in order to guard against such an evil, I am entirely willing that the amendment shall be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In section six, line twenty, after the word "other," I move to insert the word "public," and in the same line after the word "States," I move to insert the words "not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, and to which a preemption or homestead claim may not have attached as aforesaid, and designated by odd numbers;" and after the word "lying," in the same line, to insert "nearest to said tier of granted sections;" so that the clause will read:

But if by reason of sale by the United States, or by preemption or homestead right attaching to any such alternate section or part of a section so hereby granted to said company, or if from any other cause the said company shall be unable to locate or receive the whole of five full alternate sections per mile for each mile on each side of said road, it shall in either case be lawful for said company to select, locate, and receive patents for so much of the other public lands of the United States not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, and to which a preemption or homestead claim may not have attached as aforesaid, and denominated by odd numbers, lying nearest to said tier of granted sections, within twenty miles of each side of said road, as will make up the quantity granted, &c.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to that amendment, but it is provided for by other provisions of the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. In the twenty-seventh line of the same section, after the word "company," I move to insert the following words: "except such as shall be necessary to the operating and working of said mines." The clause proposed to be amended reads thus:

But all mineral lands, except those containing mines of iron or coal, shall be excluded from the operation of this section, although where the same shall contain timber the timber thereon is hereby granted to said company.

A sufficiency of timber requisite to the operation of a mine is as necessary as the mine itself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from California will allow me, why not strike out this grant of timber to the company? They will have other lands in lieu of these mineral lands.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that that grant is made to them in the act of 1862, and it is now in the nature of a vested right, and I understand this is a continuation of it. That, of course, involves a very important question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator does not understand me. Notwithstanding it was in the law of 1862, the bill we are now passing will not be binding upon the companies unless they accept it, and if they do accept it, that would do away with the vested right.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator from Illinois is right. Under the law as it now stands the companies are not permitted to go outside of the ten mile limits to make up for deficiencies, nor are they allowed to go on any mineral lands. As an equivalent for being excluded from all mineral lands, it was provided that they might take the timber off the mineral lands; but this bill now provides that they may go outside of the ten mile limits, within twenty miles, in order to select lands to make up the deficiency. Hence I think they ought not to be allowed to go outside of the sweep of the timber that may be found in that country.

Mr. CONNESS. If that is the understanding, I will agree to the striking out of this clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California withdraw his amendment?

Mr. POMEROY. I hope not.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not. It is suggested, however, that the grant of timber contained in the clause that I propose to modify by my amendment shall be stricken out.

Mr. POMEROY. A great deal of this land is called mineral land where there are no mines. The surveyors will return a whole tract of country as mineral land, although but a small portion of it may contain mines. The amendment of the Senator from California, however, is a good one. There may be some mines, and wherever there are mines there should be a sufficient amount of timber reserved to the mines for their working.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas. Notwithstanding the grant made to these companies, wherever the mineral lands are excepted from the grant there should be a reservation of sufficient timber to go with those mines to provide for their working. That is a necessity. Otherwise you expose the persons upon those lands engaged in mining to any tax that the owners of this timber may see fit to impose. I will ask the Senator from Illinois whether he desires to strike out that clause?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought there was no necessity for it. Where they do not get the mineral land they get other land in lieu of it, and they are just as likely to get timber upon that. I do not see that there is any necessity for the clause. I am not particular about it.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I wish to insert the words I have offered as an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will suggest to the Senator from California that his amendment would be very likely to lead to complications and difficulties between the proprietors of the mines and the company as to what timber will be necessary for the working of the mines. I do not really think there is much importance in the grant of timber upon these lands to the company, because, if the company do not get the lands where the minerals are, they will get other lands in lieu of them, and they will be just as likely to get timber on those other lands as on the mineral lands. I do not think there is any importance in it. If the amendment that the Senator suggests is inserted, he will readily see that it will lead to disputes as to what is necessary.

Mr. CONNESS. In a mining country there can be no dispute as to what is necessary. To work a mine, certain tunneling and bridging is necessary, and certain timber is necessary for that purpose. Everybody understands it. There will be no trouble between the miners and the proprietors in this case, the grantees coming to an exact understanding. I wish in every case where the timber is granted to insert a provision of this kind. If the Government allows the people to work those lands and search for minerals and precious metals in them, they should be protected in the use of the necessary amount of timber to facilitate that work.

Mr. HARLAN. I had prepared an amendment to offer to the amendment of the committee proposing to insert the words that I hold in my hand, which I think will cover the case, at the same point that the Senator suggests. My amendment would be to insert after the word "company" in the twenty-seventh line of the sixth section these words:

To the extent that said selections, together with the granted sections and parts of sections, may fall short of ten full sections per mile.

So that if they were unable to secure ten full sections of land per mile on account of the existence of mineral lands and not agricultural lands, and if these mineral lands should contain timber, they may take the timber from the mineral lands to an amount sufficient to make up the full number of ten sections per mile. Although they would not receive the land, it being mineral, they would receive the timber growing on the land; if otherwise, they would receive the land had it not been mineral.

Mr. CONNESS. That covers it exactly.

Mr. HARLAN. I think this amendment will effect the object, if the Senator will adopt it.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator; but in addition to that—I will pass it by now—it will require a provision such as I have suggested.

I want to be clearly understood, if possible, before I take my seat, on this point. I understand that by the act of 1862 the timber upon the lands in the mining section of the country—and in California it covers a distance of about one hundred and twenty miles on the line of the road—for ten miles wide on each side of the road has been granted to the company as an absolute grant. The mines are permitted to be worked there by the Government, and the lands containing the mines are not granted to the company; and I desire that a provision be inserted accompanying this grant of timber in every case—

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will allow me, the old bill only gave them the timber on the mineral lands of the odd sections, not of the even sections.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well. I propose that on those sections the miner shall be allowed the amount of timber necessary to operate his mine. We will come to it by and by.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand the Senator to say that he will accept the language I have sent to the Secretary as a modification of his motion.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the amendment in section ten, line twenty, after the word "thereon," by inserting the words "from the date of this indorsement;" and after the word "obligor," at the end of the twenty-third line, by inserting:

And the said indorsement shall bear the date of the completion of the section of the road on account of which it was issued, as shown by the report of the commissioners provided for in this act.

So that the clause will read:

The United States hereby undertake and agree with the lawful holder of the within bond to pay the first year's interest accruing thereon, from the date of this indorsement, as a gratuity to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the obligor, and to pay the interest accruing thereon for the subsequent nineteen years, immediately upon default of such payment by said obligor; and the said indorsement shall bear the date of the completion of the section of the road on account of which it was issued, as shown by the report of the commissioners provided for in this act.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know but that that amendment may be in the usual form. It occurs to me, however, that the body of the bond will provide in itself when and where the interest shall be paid, and this indorsement on the back of the bond that the interest shall be reckoned from the date of that indorsement may conflict with the body of the bond itself. Each bond in itself provides when it shall be paid, and where the principal and interest shall be paid. I do not think it is contemplated that the interest should bear from the date of the indorsement, but from the time specified in the bond.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the honorable Senator from Iowa entertains a wrong apprehension as to the railroad scheme which the bill proposes. The company—I take as an example the Union Pacific Railroad Company—on its organization, and on the passage of this bill, will have the right at once to issue its own corporate bonds under its corporate seal, to sell them to A, B, C, and D, to any person who may see fit to buy them, to fill the market with them, if you please, to the amount of millions upon millions. That is the corporate right of the company. The United States undertake to guaranty the payment of twenty years' interest upon these bonds; but they do not give this guarantee until the various sections of forty or twenty miles of the road shall have been completed, and until evidence of that completion is submitted to the President of the United States, and by him to the Secretary of the Treasury. How would this operate then? If the obligation of the Government to pay the interest on the bonds is not to accrue and commence until the indorsement is actually made upon the bond by the Secretary of the Treasury, there will be great difficulties arising from it. These bonds may be sold in the market on the faith of the statute which we are about to pass, that the Government will pay the twenty years' interest upon them from the date of the bond; that is, from the date of its issue. That is the only value connected with the guarantee of the United States. It is the principal element which gives credit and value to the bond of the company, that the Government of the United States shall pay the interest for twenty years from its date, and not merely from the date of the indorsement. We do not know at what date the bond may be made. It may be made to-day; it may be made ten years hence. It is immaterial to the United States what the date of the bond may be. The undertaking of the Government is to pay ten years' interest upon it, beginning with the date of the bond.

Mr. CONNESS. It seems to me also, sir, that this is a very proper consideration as contained in the bill as we now find it: the guarantee of the Government should be entirely separate and apart from the body of the bond, which is the work of the company.

Mr. HARLAN. This is an important amendment, I admit. If the bill should take effect as it now stands, and the company should put under contract the whole line of this road and issue bonds for the construction, as it may, to one contractor, the bonds would bear date of course from the date of the contract; I will suppose it to be the date of the taking effect of this law. The bonds will run until the holders choose to present them to the Secretary of the Treasury for an indorsement. They need not present any of them at any particular time; and the company may have thirteen full years under this bill for the completion of the road. If at any time after completing forty miles of a certain portion of the road or twenty miles of other sections of the road the bonds are presented to the Secretary of the Treasury, he will be compelled to make this indorsement and the interest will become due, first from the company but in the end from the Treasury of the United States, from the date of the bond, which may be thirteen years from the time the bond was issued; and this must be paid in gold and silver. The whole amount of more than the face of the bond would thus be due from the Government of the United States the very moment that the Secretary placed on the bond this indorsement. I supposed that the object of the committee was—that is my desire at least—to obligate the Government to pay the interest on these bonds from the date of the completion of each section of the road, for a period of twenty years, provided the company should fail to pay it.

Mr. HOWARD. It is in that point that the Senator from Iowa is entirely mistaken. The committee intend that the holders of the bonds issued by the company shall have the benefit of the Government credit for any purpose connected with this road, and that that benefit shall accrue to the company and to the holder of the bond the moment this bill shall become a law, so that they may take their bonds into the market and sell them and raise money to go on with the work. The holders of the bonds are not to wait nor are the companies to wait until after the road shall be completed. To make such a requisition in the bill would be to defeat the scheme almost entirely. Let me refer once again to the clause. Section eight of the bill which I hold in my hand declares—

That no United States bonds shall be issued under the act of which this is an amendment; but the said company may make, execute, and issue its own first mortgage bonds, to be signed by its president and secretary, and sealed with the corporate seal of the company, to the following amounts in respect of the following parts of said road, and under the following conditions, to wit:

They may issue the bonds whenever they see fit under their corporate seal. Then section ten is as follows:

That for the purpose of aiding said company in the construction, completion, and equipment of said railroad and telegraph line from the initial point on the said one hundredth meridian of west longitude to its western point of termination on the western boundary of the Territory of Nevada, such first mortgage bonds of said Union Pacific Railroad Company may be produced to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States—

They may be produced at any time—

And upon the presentation to him [the Secretary] of the certificates of the said commissioners of the completion and equipment as herein required of any of the portions of forty miles or twenty miles, as the case may be, or of consecutive portions exceeding these portions in length, the Secretary of the Treasury shall indorse upon each and every of such first mortgage bonds so produced to him under his hand the guarantee of the United States of the payment of the interest thereon, in the following words, namely:

Then follows the guarantee. The same section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all such bonds to be kept for that purpose, in which all the bonds are to be described. It goes further, and declares that the Secretary shall note upon each of the bonds the certificate under which it is issued; that is, the certificate of the commissioners of the completion of such and such a section of the road. The Secretary is to note upon each of the bonds the "certificate under which the same is issued by proper numbers or other distinct mode of identification." The very object, therefore, which the Senator seems to have in view is already accomplished by the bill, inasmuch as it requires the Secretary, whenever he puts upon the back of one of these bonds the Government guarantee, to note upon the bond the certificate under which it has been issued. There can be no misapprehension or mistakes as to the sections of the road to which these various bonds appertain. Every bond is to be properly registered and entered in a book to be kept by the Secretary of the Treasury. The great misapprehension of the Senator from Iowa seems to have been that the bonds were not to be issued until the road was completed. If we should wait until that time the contractors and the company would be entirely deprived of all benefit of the Government guarantee during the long and tedious period of constructing the road.

Mr. SHERMAN. My attention was not before called to the difficulty that may grow out of this bill; and I think it is a question well worthy of the consideration of the honorable Senator from Michigan. It is a much more difficult matter than he imagines it to be. The eighth section authorizes the company to issue their bonds, but does not require them to be issued only as the road progresses, or as the road is completed. The tenth section requires the Secretary of the Treasury to guaranty the payment of the interest on the bonds. Suppose that in advance of the completion of any portion of the road they should issue bonds to the amount of $10,000,000. After the first section of the road is completed, the United States must guaranty the payment of the interest that has already accrued, past due, as you may say. Is that the purpose of the bill? That is not my idea of the bill, and I could not vote for it if such a construction were placed upon it.

My idea is this: that the persons who invest their capital in this undertaking should proceed to complete forty miles of the road, and then we should authorize them to issue their own bonds to a certain amount, to be fixed by the law, and, simultaneously with the issue of their bonds, the United States should guaranty the payment of the interest. That, I think, is the meaning of the two sections when you take them together; but if there is any doubt about it, that doubt ought to be removed. The eighth section, it seems to me, ought to contain a proviso that no bonds should be issued by the company until it had completed a certain section of the road, and that they should be issued from time to time as the road was completed, and, simultaneously with their issue, the Secretary of the Treasury should make the guarantee. In any other way you might place it in the power of the directors of this railroad company to issue their bonds to a large sum, thirty or forty million dollars, sell those bonds, and get the money in their own hands without security to the Government, and yet you would compel the Government, as they construct the road section by section, to guaranty the interest on the bonds, although one half of the interest may have accrued. It would throw upon the United States the interest of the whole of the bonds from this date, at the pleasure of the railroad company, and compel them to pay all the past accrued interest, although the road was not completed.

The intention of Congress, as gathered from these two sections is, to authorize the railroad company to issue their own bonds instead of receiving bonds from the United States. Under the old act this railroad company could not receive the bonds of the United States until they completed a section of forty miles, and then they would have a right to demand the bonds of the United States. The main idea of this bill is, instead of issuing the bonds of the United States, to authorize the companies to issue their own bonds with the guarantee of the United States of the interest. The same limitation as to the time when these bonds should be issued should be attached to section eight of this bill as was contained in the act of 1862, that the bonds shall not be issued until after a section of the road has been completed, and then the guarantee shall be made simultaneously. If that is done, there can be no trouble about it. There will be no practical difficulty in the way, because this railroad company should not expect the guarantee of the United States except as they build this road section by section. The sections of the road have been made less in this bill than in the old one in order not to throw too much burden upon them, and to give them the full benefit of the aid of the Government from time to time as they completed the sections of the road. I should dislike very much to vote for this bill with a construction that would authorize the company to issue the aggregate of their bonds now, and then as the road was completed to compel the United States to pay in gold the interest past due that had been accumulating for two, three, four, or five years. I do not think that was the intention in framing the bill, and I do not think it is right to pass it if there is any danger of such a construction.

Mr. CONNESS. That was not the intention of the bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I agree with the Senator from Ohio measurably. I do not think it was the intention. If that is the construction to be placed upon it, we will certainly have the bill altered. But I do not think it is the intention of the bill, I do not think it is the letter or the spirit of the bill, that this railroad company should issue a large amount of railroad bonds, and sell them before they complete forty miles or any other portion of the road. As I understand it, this bill or amendment reported by the committee is simply a substitute for the old law in this particular. The law of 1862 granted $16,000 a mile, principal and interest, for thirty years; this bill grants the interest of $24,000 a mile for twenty years. The interest on $24,000 for twenty years is exactly equal to the interest on $16,000 for thirty years. The difference between this bill and the act of 1862 is just $16,000. Under the old bill we were to get the principal and interest from the Government in case the company should prove a defaulter, and under this bill we simply get the interest. It is better than the old bill to the company, as $16,000 a mile is better than nothing.

Mr. CONNESS. Why does the Senator say "we?"

Mr. POMEROY. I say "we" because, in common with all the men of the West, I feel interested in this road, and I use it only in that regard.

Mr. President, this bill is so guarded, or should be, that when forty miles of the road are completed and certificates presented to the president that such is the fact, the bonds should then for the first time be presented to the Secretary of the Treasury and he should then indorse upon them the guarantee of the Government, and they should be held for twenty years only from that date. There is no mistake about that. They should not be held to pay for any interest that had accrued on the bond prior to presentation, because there may be a conflict between parties. Here may be various parties holding these bonds, and as soon as forty miles of the road are built, A, B, and C may rush to the Secretary of the Treasury for his guarantee, and there will be a conflict which will have no end. This measure should be so guarded that the bonds should not of necessity even be issued or presented until forty miles of the road are built, and then only enough bonds should be issued and presented to meet the guarantee contained in the bill, which is, on this side of the Rocky mountains, $24,000 a mile.

I desire to make one other remark. I do not know that it is for the interest of this road or the Government that these bonds should of necessity run thirty years. The Government guarantees the interest for twenty years. Why not allow the company if it chooses to issue twenty-year bonds?

Mr. HOWARD. They can.

Mr. POMEROY. They cannot under this bill. Under this bill they are obligated to have thirty-year bonds, as will be seen by looking to the provision in section eight, on the 20th page of the bill:

Said company may make and execute as aforesaid its first mortgage bonds in sums of $1,000 each, payable in thirty years after date.

I can conceive of a case in which the company may desire to change the nature of its bonds at the end of the twenty years when the Government guarantee shall close. I should like to have an amendment put in there to allow them to execute their bonds for a period "not exceeding thirty years." But such an amendment is not now in order, and I will not move it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is an important provision reserved to the Government. We do not want the principal of the bonds to become due when the guarantee of the Government expires. In the first place, a person would prefer a long bond to a short one. The longer a bond has to run the better it is for the holder; and it is better for the Government that the principal of the bond should not fall due at the end of their guarantee. The bondholder would then rely upon the security of the company for ten years interest after the Government guarantee should expire.

I think it will be better for all parties to leave that clause in. It was very carefully considered in committee, and it was fully discussed. It was discussed and acted upon and adopted in accordance with the opinions of good, able financiers and also the railroad men themselves. They thought that on the whole it was wiser to allow the guarantee of the Government to extend only for a portion of the time the bond had to run, so that the bondholder himself should have an interest in the construction of the road for the ultimate payment of the interest and the ultimate payment of the bond. It was deemed better for all parties that the bond should run a long period of time, and therefore the term was fixed at thirty years.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like the company to have the right to issue them for thirty years. My query was whether they should be compelled to issue them for that length of time.

Mr. HARLAN. Under the law of 1862 the Government of the United States proposed to issue its bonds after a section of the road should have been found to be completed according to the terms of the act by commissioners to be appointed by the Government. The Government bonds thus issued after the completion of a section of the road were to bear interest. The company was to provide for the payment of the interest on the Government bonds, and the Government took a mortgage on the road, its rolling stock, and all its effects, to secure the reimbursement of the Government for the interest the company might fail to pay, and for the face of the bond if the company should fail to pay the face of the Government bond when it matured; so that under the law as it now stands the Government did not obligate itself to pay a single dollar of principal or interest on the bonds issued on account of any section of the road until after the section of the road had been completed.

This bill as it now stands provides that the Government shall not issue its bonds, but that the companies shall issue their bonds, and the Government shall guaranty that the companies will pay the interest on their bonds; but it does not provide that these company bonds shall be issued only at the date of the completion of a section of the road. The bonds may be issued at any moment after the passage of the bill, and after they shall have issued the interest begins to run, and may run any length of time from one day to thirteen years; and after a section of the road shall have been completed, and the company shall fail to meet the interest due on the bond for the entire period elapsing from the date of the bond to the date of the completion of the road, it will be due from the Treasury of the United States, provided the companies do not pay it themselves.

This might work a very great hardship at the Treasury. I have made a little computation here. On some sections of the road the companies are permitted to issue bonds to the amount of $96,000 per mile. These bonds will bear six per cent. interest, which would be $5,760 a year per mile. Now if the company should be ten years in completing such a section, there would have accrued interest on the bonds used to secure the completion of one mile of such section $11,520, and on a section of twenty miles during a period of ten years there would have accrued interest to the amount of $1,152,000, all of which would be due from the Treasury of the United States the very moment the Secretary of the Treasury made his indorsement across the back of the bond.

I suppose that the object of the committee was, and in my judgment it ought to be, to obligate the Government to pay interest on these bonds from the date of the completion of each section of the road, and not to obligate it to go back and meet the interest that may have accrued preceding that period. These companies ought to have some money of their own. They ought not to "kite" this work through on the credit of the Government alone. They ought to be able to raise money enough to build one section of the road on their own credit, on the per cent. to be paid in on the stock subscribed. Why do you require them to take stock and to pay in a per cent. on that stock unless they are expected to use some of their own money? Then let them use their own money until they shall have built one section of the road, and then issue their bonds to enable them to raise money to proceed to the completion of an additional section. The bill, as it stands, would not require the company to raise means to build a single mile of this road.

I think this amendment or some equivalent amendment ought to be adopted. I was well pleased with the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio; perhaps that would be better; and if he would offer an amendment of that kind, I should with great pleasure adopt it in place of my own.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, it cannot be very material to the Government of the United States at what time it shall make good its guarantee of the payment of the twenty years' interest upon these bonds. We shall probably be compelled to pay the most of this twenty years' interest.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the Senator indulge me one moment?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is true, as was stated by the Senator from Iowa, and as the gentlemen of the committee all understand, that we agreed upon the principles on which this bill was to be framed, and for the purpose of reducing it to a proper form it was placed in the hands of the chairman, and was very well committed to his hands; but I think I cannot be mistaken in this: I distinctly understood that it was to require a section of the road to be completed before the bonds were to issue. It will be recollected by the members of the committee that we made the sections in California twenty miles in length in order to enable the company to finish them and to get some bonds a little sooner. If the bill is drawn as now represented, that these bonds can issue before a section of the road is completed and certified to by the commissioners, it is entirely different from what I understood it.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know what may have been the understanding of the Senator from Vermont on that subject. All I know is that this clause in the bill after having been drafted by myself was read over to the committee assembled together for the purpose of considering it. It is very true there was no special discussion relating to this particular feature of the bill; and therefore it is doubtless true, as the honorable Senator from Vermont says, that he understood the bonds were not to issue until after the various sections of the road should be completed.

Mr. COLLAMER. Scrutin as they were completed.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no doubt that that was his understanding; but at the same time I cannot say that that was my understanding. The difference, it will be observed, is very important, very striking. It is certainly true that if the Government guaranties the payment of the interest upon the bond for twenty years from and after the date of the bond, it does give to the corporate bond a greater value in the market, because a person willing to invest his money in such a bond would be more willing to buy and would pay a larger price for it, knowing that he had the agreement of the United States to pay the interest from the date of the bond. The bond, therefore, would be very likely to sell for a larger sum in the market than it would if the interest was not to be paid by the Government of the United States until there should be a certainty of the completion of the work to which it was attached.

I do not, however, regard it as of much importance whether this particular feature of the bill shall be retained or whether it shall be so altered as to prohibit the issuing of these bonds until the work is completed. So far as the United States is concerned, I shall feel better satisfied to have the amendment of the honorable Senator from Iowa adopted; but at the same time I must say that in my judgment it will greatly embarrass the company in the construction of the road; because it will throw upon the stockholders of the road, at first at least, the entire burden of raising the cash means for prosecuting the work. If we help them at all, we may as well help them in their infancy, in the midst of their struggles, as to wait until they are grown men.

Mr. CONNESS. I confess that my understanding was like that of the honorable Senator from Vermont, and my judgment now is that a proper consideration of safety requires that the bonds should bear date from the period of their indorsement by the Government. Although we aid these companies very largely, this aid is predicated and granted to them upon their ability to enter upon the building of the road and to construct forty or twenty miles, as the case may be, themselves, by their own means, as a beginning. Upon the construction of twenty or forty miles, as the case may be, they are to have their bonds prepared, and upon the certificate of the commissioners appointed by the President that that length of the road has been constructed, they are to receive the indorsement of the Government, and from that date the interest and the responsibility of the Government for that interest is to begin. That is my clear understanding, and it is my decided judgment that it should be adopted as the rule; and therefore I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Iowa.

I do not agree with my friend, the chairman of the committee, that it will affect the value of the bonds in the market at all. Indeed, I would not wish those bonds to have any value or to be put in the market until they had the indorsement of the Government made upon them. It will be observed by the Senate that the companies already engaged in the building of this road, both on this side and on the Pacific side of the continent, and who have issued bonds of their own to aid them in the construction of the road, are furnished abundant means by the provisions of this bill for converting these bonds into the Government bonds provided to be issued. I am decidedly in favor of such a provision as was indicated in the remarks made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Iowa will withdraw his amendment I will offer an amendment to be added to the eighth section which I think will accomplish this purpose and relieve us from this difficulty.

Mr. HARLAN. If it be in order I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Several SENATORS. Let the other amendment be read first for information.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Provided, That no bonds the interest of which is to be guarantied by the United States shall be issued by said company, except from time to time as a section of its road is completed and its completion is certified by the Secretary of the Treasury, as herein provided.

Mr. POMEROY. The completion is to be certified by the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is to be certified to by Secretary of the Treasury by the tenth section.

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir; it is to be certified by the President to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator to leave out the designation of any officer to whom the completion of the road shall be certified, and let it stand to be certified as required by this act.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I will so modify it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa accept the amendment of the Senator from Ohio in lieu of his own?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. Where does it come in?

Mr. SHERMAN. At the end of the eighth section, because it is appropriate to that section.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask that it may be read again as modified.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

That no bonds the interest of which is to be guarantied by the United States shall be issued by said company, except from time to time as a section of its road is completed, and its completion is certified as herein provided.

Mr. HOWARD. It should read "by any of said companies."

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I now renew the amendment that I withdrew some time since, to add at the end of the sixth section the following:

Provided, That in all grants of timber growing upon mineral lands made to the companies designated, there shall be reserved to the person or persons engaged in working and operating any mines on such lands sufficient timber for the successful operation of the same.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not perceive the practical effect of the amendment. The bill as it now stands, with the amendments that have been adopted ed, provides that the odd sections to the extent of ten sections a mile shall be granted to this company if found within the limits of twenty miles on each side of the road.

NEW SERIES...No. 151.

Mr. CONNESS. Ten miles in my State.

Mr. HARLAN. But they may go out to the extent of twenty miles. If they are unable to find so large a quantity of agricultural land, and they find timber growing on odd sections that are mineral land and thereby excluded from the operation of the grant, the company may take the timber. That is the effect of the bill as it now stands. This amendment, if I comprehend it, proceeds to say that the timber thus granted to the company may be used by miners working mines on the land. That, then, would be to take from the company the timber growing on mineral lands which otherwise would become their timber had the land been agricultural land. In other words, it limits the grant to the company. If that is the intention of the Senator, I understand it. Personally I have no objection to it, but it seems to me that we ought to grant the timber at least, if we cannot grant the land to the extent of ten sections a mile.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator was acquainted with the section of country on the west slope of the Sierra Nevada mountains, I know he would favor the adoption of this amendment. It is perhaps one of the finest timber regions of the world. There are very few sections of it that do not contain the most magnificent forests of timber. The effect of passing this bill as it now stands, making the grant as it was made in the original act of 1862, would be to compel the miners, although they are permitted to work the mines upon the land from which the timber is given to the companies, to purchase the timber necessary for the operation of their mines from those companies; and it would therefore subject that branch of industry to just such tax and price as those companies might see fit to impose. I do not pretend to say that the companies in this case would act unjustly or oppressively; but we are now making a law. That law includes a grant of lands to these companies where they can get them, and of timber upon the lands where they cannot take the lands. Those lands, almost invaluable, contain minerals. They are now settled upon. There are hundreds, I may say thousands, of miners' homes upon them. Will you say that the miner shall not cut a stick of timber from the forest beneath which his mine is, for the proper working of that mine, without being subjected to such a price as these companies may see fit to demand from him? I hope not. I take it it is our interest, our highest interest to promote by every means in our power the production of the precious metals. We want them, and we should encourage their production.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope this amendment of the Senator from California will prevail, from the fact that almost that whole region of country has been declared to be mineral land.

Mr. CONNESS. And is all excepted from sale and survey.

Mr. POMEROY. The railroad companies will get title to none of them, and they ought not to monopolize all the timber. Wherever there are mines to be opened, and wherever a miner settles, he ought, at least, to have timber sufficient for his use.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that the Senator from Iowa assents to the amendment; but I wish to make one suggestion to him to which I do not think his attention has been called. Upon the lands, the timber upon which is thus granted, there are now settled farmers in the little nooks and valleys, men who have made their homes there forever, men whose homes have been made there for ten or twelve years last past. We are absolutely granting the timber upon those men's homes. I think some additional provision or reservation should be made in favor of the parties who are located and settled and have their homes upon these lands, in addition to the reservation to miners. I think this amendment is but just and fair. Otherwise, we shall subject these people, not generally rich people, persons who have gone into the forest to reduce the wilderness to civilization, to just such a price as the companies may see fit to impose. Before the bill passes I shall prepare an additional amendment, which shall at least require the companies to convey the timber at some reasonable price. That will apply to the question of settlement between the companies and the persons located upon these lands.

Mr. HARLAN. I think all the cases the Senator has described are protected now sufficiently by the preemption laws.

Mr. CONNESS. Let me say to the Senator that this whole region is exempted by congressional act from survey and sale, and the preemption laws do not apply. The miners are there by no legal right. They are simply permitted to be there by the Government.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the preemption laws now apply to all the Territories of the United States and all the States of the Union.

Mr. CONNESS. They do not. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HARLAN. It was doubtful a few years ago whether they did apply to California; but in a bill that was enacted two years since the preemption laws were extended to the whole country; and I think these parties may avail themselves of the benefit of the preemption laws if they choose to do so.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg the Senator's pardon. He is certainly in error in this matter. The preemption laws do not apply to what are denominated by congressional act mineral lands in California, but those lands, on the contrary, are specifically exempted from survey and sale; neither do the preemption laws apply to the lands within exterior boundaries upon which Spanish grants are claimed to have been made.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator is right in that.

Mr. CONNESS. And in the other also.

Mr. HARLAN. I believe they do not apply to the mineral lands or private claims.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well. These are all mineral lands. I will draw up a provision to meet the case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the amendment read.

The Secretary read it, to insert at the end of the sixth section the following:

Provided, That in all grants of timber growing upon mineral lands made to the companies designated herein, there shall be reserved to the person or persons engaged in the working and operating any mines on such lands sufficient timber for the successful operation of the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that as long as the present policy is adopted; but I would rather reserve to the United States this privilege, because we have never yet by legislation given to the miners the right to mine on the mineral lands. It is a great question, one which I do not wish to decide in an indirect way. The object of the Senator would be accomplished by reserving this timber to the United States. We have never interfered with these miners. I believe we do in the tax bill, much to the regret of the Senator, propose to tax the miner to get some kind of revenue from mining. I am inclined to think that this will be impliedly a surrender of the rights of the United States, a surrender never yet made by express law, although it has been done practically by custom.

I simply wish to call the attention of Senators to the implied effect of this amendment, the reservation of a right to the miners, which we have never yet given by express legislation. If we deliberately made up our minds to give to all persons the right to go and mine upon any lands of the United States for gold and silver, it would be well enough to reserve to the miners these things; but if not, we had better reserve them to the United States, and then let the United States by a well-prepared law grant to all its citizens and other persons the right to mine in the mineral lands of the United States—a thing never yet done by law, I believe.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator has raised a very nice distinction indeed, but it will be observed that the Senator is not exactly right; we are making a grant absolute in its character of the timber upon the mineral lands, or a certain amount of them, to this company, and if we pass this bill without any reservation that grant is complete. Therefore, the man mining in the land beneath its surface will be subject to just such price and tax as the parties to whom we grant this timber shall see fit to impose. The language of this amendment does not contain any legal concession to the miner concerning the mines. We know it is a fact that they mine. Does the Senator deny that? I simply say in this amendment that the men engaged in mining, as permitted by the United States, shall be entitled to take the few sticks of timber they may require for carrying on their business purposes without being considered trespassers. Trespassers against whom? Against the grantees that we are now about to enfranchise.

Mr. POMEROY. They will need timber for firewood also.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly; but that, I presume, follows as a matter of course, for they could not live without that.

I am sorry that the Senator should raise this question here, and see in this proposition a purpose to concede indirectly a right which, as the Senator says, has not yet been given, but which, in my opinion, should have been given long since. There is no difference of opinion in the great mining section of this country as to whether the United States should continue to regard its citizens as trespassers upon the public domain because they engaged in the business of mining. We only find those jealousies existing in the minds of gentlemen who live on the other side of the continent; gentlemen who, if they extended the area of their travels, would also undoubtedly change their opinions.

The Senator says we are now about to tax the mines. We will discuss that subject when it comes up. Although the Government up to this time has not taken each miner by the throat, or in a more civil way met him by its agent or tax collector, and said, "Sir, one twentieth of your production is mine," the Senator will not deny that this war could not be conducted to-day were it not for the production of those mines. Without them you could not have issued with any credit $400,000,000 of legal-tender notes; and your banks could not emit their issues as they do, giving money sufficiently extensive for all the operations of trade at this time.

But, sir, that question is not pertinent to this discussion. I cannot see that the amendment is obnoxious to the objection made by the Senator. It simply says to these companies, You shall own all the timber upon the lands spoken of, except so much of it as the man operating the mines thereon shall need for his purposes, and which is as necessary to him as the water he drinks or the air he breathes.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senate has now been engaged for some time on this bill; it is very evident that we cannot get through with it to-day; and it is very important to have an executive session.

Mr. HOWARD. I think we can get through with the bill this afternoon.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will allow us to come to a vote on this question.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we may get through with this bill and then go into executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it is very evident that we cannot get through with the bill to-day. A great many Senators have already left the Chamber. If there should be any time to be filled up after we dispose of executive business, before the usual hour of adjournment, I should be willing to come back to legislative business. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope not.

Mr. CONNESS. That motion is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To a certain extent.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, sir, I will not debate it long. I wish to make an appeal to the Senator from New York. This bill, as the Senator well knows and appreciates, is of the greatest possible consequence; it has been considered day after day, and the discussions upon it are now pretty well over. It is of the greatest importance that we should dispose of this bill before the internal tax bill comes upon us, which will claim all our attention, and is so necessary. I hope the Senator will not persist in his motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I entirely agree with the Senator from California in regard to the importance of this bill, and because it is important, it seems to me we ought not to proceed with it when the Senate is so thin. It is now quite late; a great many Senators who are usually here are now absent; and it is important that this executive session should take place. If Senators are willing to remain half an hour hence, when the executive business shall be disposed of, they might continue the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. They will not do any legislative business after they go into executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. I will not press the motion for a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn, and the question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In section ten, line ninety-one, after the word "same" I move to insert these words, "and such other evidence as the said Secretary may require;" so that the proviso will read:

And provided further, That before any bonds shall be so guaranteed by the United States, the company claiming them shall present to the Secretary of the Treasury an affidavit of the president and secretary of the company, to be sworn to before the judge of a court of record, setting forth whether said company has issued any such bonds or securities, and if so, particularly describing the same, and such other evidence as the said Secretary may require so as to enable said Secretary to make the deduction, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. To perfect the language, it would be well to strike out the words "said Secretary" at the end of the ninety-first line and to insert the word "him."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. There is another amendment that should be made to make the bill harmonize with the provision already adopted. In section eight, line four, after the word "bond" there should be inserted, I think, the words, "as sections are completed according to the provisions of this act;" so that it will read:

That no United States bonds shall be issued under the act of which this is an amendment; but the said company may make, execute, and issue its own first mortgage bonds as sections are completed according to the provisions of this act.

Mr. HOWARD. That amendment will be made necessary in consequence of the adoption of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following amendment to be inserted at the end of section ten:

Provided, also, That no land granted by this act shall be conveyed to any party or parties, and no bonds shall be indorsed and the interest thereon be paid or guaranteed to be paid to any company or companies, party or parties, on account of any road or part thereof made prior to the passage of the act to which this is an amendment, or made subsequent thereto under the provisions of any act other than this act and the act amended by this act.

The object of the amendment is to prevent parties who may have constructed sections of road heretofore coming in and claiming them to be a part of this road and presenting certificates of the completion of sections of their road and receiving bonds thereon.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to understand the Senator from Iowa. We have twenty-five miles of a road in running order and forty miles graded.

Mr. HARLAN. Built under the provisions of the act of 1862?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARLAN. This amendment will not affect that.

Mr. HOWARD. Let the amendment be read again.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if it is proposed that that forty miles shall be completed under this bill or under the bill of 1862?

Mr. HOWARD. The company building it will be entitled to the benefits and privileges granted by this act, although the actual construction of it was under the former act. Every right is preserved by the present bill which has accrued, and every remedy is also preserved to the party claiming it in the same manner as if this bill had not been passed. Every right is secured to every person and every corporation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. On page 44, section twenty, line six, I move to strike out the words "the President of the United States shall prescribe," and insert "now provided by law." This section provides that the tracks of the respective roads shall be of such uniform width as the President of the United States shall prescribe, and it is necessary to change that phraseology.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to have an explanation of that amendment from the Senator from Iowa. This is the same language that was embraced in the act of 1862.

Mr. HARLAN. Since the passage of the act of 1862 Congress has passed a law fixing the gauge of the road, and that is now the law of the land.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I have no objection.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend on page 49, line thirty-four of section twenty-one, after the word "dollars" by inserting "and such other damage as he may have suffered on account of said refusal or failure;" and in line thirty-five by striking out the words, "in an action of debt;" so that the clause will read:

On pain of forfeiting to the person injured, for each offense, the sum of $100, and such other damage as he may have suffered on account of said refusal or failure, to be sued for and recovered in any court of the United States, &c.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me inquire of the honorable Senator from Iowa whether he contemplates that this shall be all one proceeding, the collection of the penalty of $100 for each offense, and also the private damages which may have accrued. I do not fully understand his amendment. There seems to be a little incompatibility in recovering these two things in the same suit.

Mr. HARLAN. That may be so in some States; but it would not be so in Iowa under our laws, and I suppose there will be no difficulty in bringing two suits in States where you cannot bring a suit for a sum that is fixed and also for a sum not fixed in one action. This contemplates that the action shall be brought for the exact sum of $100, and therefore the action is to be styled an action of debt, not assumpsit; but in the States where any difficulty may accrue on this account, two suits may be brought.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend on page 50, section twenty-two, line eight, by striking out the words "not exceeding ten dollars," and inserting "less than $1 25;" and in lines twelve and thirteen of the same section, by striking out "right of purchase with bonds shall only be exercised as to Government sections, and subdivisions thereof," and inserting "purchase shall be made in legal sections and subdivisions of sections;" so that the clause will read:

Paying or allowing to such company such price for any such lands as shall be agreed upon, not less than $1 25 per acre; and the guarantee of the Government for the payment of interest on any such bonds, so used, in payment for lands shall thereupon cease and be extinguished: Provided, however, That such purchase shall be made in legal sections and subdivisions of sections.

Mr. HOWARD. If I understand this amendment properly, it seems to me it ought not to be adopted. Section twenty-two authorizes the holders of the bonds of any of the companies named in the act, upon which the Government guarantees the payment of any interest, to use such bonds in payment for any lands herein granted to the companies issuing the bonds, at the par value of the bonds, paying or allowing to such company such price for any such lands as shall be agreed upon, not exceeding ten dollars per acre. How does the amendment alter that?

Mr. HARLAN. If the amendment shall be amended as I propose, they may sell the land for as much as the purchaser may agree to give, not less than $1 25 an acre.

Mr. HOWARD. This requires the company to sell all such land at a sum not exceeding ten dollars per acre; that is the maximum which the company can charge for any of its lands to the purchaser. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this. I do not know whether it is worth while to retain that maximum, but it seems to me there should be some limit beyond which the company cannot go in charging third persons for their lands.

Mr. HARLAN. This section contemplates that the holders of bonds the interest of which shall be guaranteed by the Government may buy the land granted under this act with the bonds, and when such purchase shall be made by the holder of the bonds, the liability of the Government to pay the interest shall cease. So the interest of the Government will be promoted by the highest possible price that the land will bring, because in that way a larger nominal amount of bonds will be invested for the land and the Government liability terminated.

In addition to this, it is an unusual provision. In all the land grants made by Congress heretofore to aid in the construction of railroads, the companies have not been limited as to the price they might charge for the land. They have been limited as to the time during which they might hold the land as a corporation, and so are these companies thus limited in this bill; but it is plainly the interest of the Government that the company shall sell the land for as high a price as possible when they sell the land for the purpose of taking up their own bonds, the interest on which this Government has guaranteed the payment of.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. In the same section there is a clause in the last two lines which reads:

And to an amount by any one holder not exceeding one such section of six hundred and forty acres in any one township.

I move to strike that out. The idea that a man may not buy more than one section in a township is ridiculous.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire now to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to an amendment I suggested the other day in line fifty-four of section thirteen, on page 32, to strike out the words "the act of which this is an amendment," and insert "this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment has already been made, the Chair is informed.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me read to the Senator the clause as it is now amended by the Senate:

The said Kansas company shall complete and equip not less than one hundred miles of its said railroad and telegraph within two years from the time of filing their assent to the provisions of this act.

That is the way it reads at present.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I was not present when that alteration was made. I have another amendment. On page 29, line twenty-one of section twelve, after the word "that," I move to insert "after the completion of said road."

Mr. HOWARD. It seems to me that does not reach the object which the honorable Senator has in view. If that amendment should be adopted, it would release the company from keeping accurate accounts until after the whole road is completed. I certainly think the honorable Senator does not intend that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. No, sir, but till after the completion of forty miles. They will, of course, receive some small amounts before the section is completed, and I do not want to put them to the trouble of keeping accounts of that.

Mr. HOWARD. But what is the objection to asking them to keep correct accounts of what they do receive?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It will be so small a matter.

Mr. HOWARD. It may be a small matter, but it may be a very considerable matter.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. We have now twenty-five miles completed. To employ a clerk to keep the accounts of the receipts of a few dollars a month seems to me to be a useless trouble to the company. I will modify the amendment by inserting "after the completion of a section of said road."

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that will not pass.

The same reason exists against it that existed against the prior amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed to any company or party entitled thereto, under this act, there shall be first paid into the Treasury of the United States the gross cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, by the said company or party in interest, which amount shall, without any further appropriation, stand to the credit of the proper account to be used by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the prosecution of the survey of the public lands along the line of said roads, and so from year to year, until the whole shall be completed, as provided under the provisions of this act.

The object of this amendment is that the companies shall pay for the survey of their own land; that is, of the land that is to be granted to them under this bill. This has become almost necessary, as it seems to me. The entire receipts from the land system do not now more than pay the expense of the system. The adoption of this bill will very greatly enlarge the work of the office here and the work in the field; and it seems to me that those who are to derive an advantage from the grant ought to pay at least for the survey of the land.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following—

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. If it is not too late, I ask for the yeas and nays on the last amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it is too late. They can be had in the Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to reconsider the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the amendment now proposed be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. HARLAN, which was in line thirty-seven of section two, on page 9, after "1877" to insert:

And at the rate of not less than one hundred miles for every year after any branch railroad shall be completed from the Missouri river to the said initial point on the one hundredth meridian.

Mr. HARLAN. The object of this is to require the company to keep at work. The bill, as it stands, provides that they shall complete the road within a given period of ten years, I think, which may be extended by the President five years more. This amendment is intended to compel them to continue the work from year to year and build at least one hundred miles every year. I believe the chairman of the committee told me he had no objections to it.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I propose now an amendment to come in on page 36, after the forty-sixth line of section fifteen, as a separate provision. If it shall be adopted, (and I wish to make this explanation,) I shall then move to strike out of section fifteen all that pertains to the Sioux City branch. The object of this amendment is to enable the companies named in the amendment to proceed to build the Sioux City branch road after a railroad shall have been completed to Sioux City through Iowa or through Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Insert after line forty-six of section fifteen:
SIoux CITY BRANCH.

That for the purposes herein mentioned the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company, the McGregor and Western Railroad Company, each of said companies being a body corporate under the laws of the State of Iowa, and the Minnesota Valley Railroad Company, the said company being a body corporate under the laws of the State of Minnesota, or any two of them so agreeing to form a consolidated company for this purpose, and in case of disagreement, then any one of them so desiring it, to be indicated by the President of the United States, whenever there shall be a line of railroad fully completed and equipped through Minnesota or Iowa to Sioux City, on the Missouri river, is hereby authorized to construct a railroad and telegraph from said Sioux City, upon the most direct and practicable route, to intersect and unite with the said railroad from said western boundary of Iowa, at such point thereon as the President of the United States shall fix, not further west than the said one hundredth meridian of longitude, and to construct the same at a rate of not less than fifty miles each year, from and after the time when any such road shall be built through Minnesota or Iowa to said Sioux City, as aforesaid; and for and in aid of such purposes the said company may do and perform, in reference to said road provided for in this section, and in reference to the construction, equipment, maintenance, and enjoyment thereof, all and singular the several acts and things hereinbefore provided, authorized, granted, or required to be done by said company; and shall be entitled to similar and like grants, benefits, immunities, guarantees, acts, and things to be done and performed by the Government of the United States, by the President of the United States, the Secretaries of the Treasury and of the Interior, or by commissioners, and be subject to like terms, conditions, restrictions, and regulations hereinbefore contained, relating to that portion of the said Union Pacific railroad and telegraph line between said initial point and said eastern base of the Rocky mountains, so far as such acts and things, grants, benefits, immunities, and guarantees are applicable to said road; the route of said road to be subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that will not prevail. I do not wish to make it a subject of debate. It is introducing into the bill matter which was not considered by the committee, and I think the whole ground is sufficiently covered already by the other provisions of the bill. The fifteenth section of the bill requires the Union Pacific Railroad Company to construct a line from Sioux City, southwestwardly, to unite with the main trunk, wherever there shall be a railroad in operation through the State of Iowa or Minnesota. Whenever that thing shall be done, it will be the duty of the Union Pacific Railroad Company to construct this branch and unite Sioux City with the main trunk, and not until then. This amendment, I believe, would authorize the consolidated companies mentioned in it to proceed at once to the construction of this branch.

Mr. HARLAN. Not at all; only when a road shall be constructed through Iowa or Minnesota to Sioux City.

Mr. HOWARD. Then it is sufficiently provided for in the bill already.

Mr. HARLAN. The only object that will be effected by this amendment, if it shall be adopted, will be to authorize these companies now organized in Iowa and Minnesota to build this branch road, under precisely the same provisions that are now in the bill, instead of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. Under the terms of the law of 1862, the Union Pacific Railroad Company was required to build this branch road, and if they failed to do so they forfeited all their rights and franchises; but under this bill there is no forfeiture, so that it amounts to merely the privilege on their part to build the road. The people in Iowa, and Minnesota, and Wisconsin, might very well doubt whether it would be the interest of any company that might be organized as the Union Pacific railroad to build a branch road to connect with their northern system of roads, and thereby divide the profits of transportation with those who own the roads directly east of the main line. It might be the interest of the Union Pacific Railroad Company under this bill not to build this branch, and if they do not there are no forfeitures. They are under no obligations whatever to build this branch road; they merely have the privilege to do so. What I seek to secure by this amendment is that this privilege to build the road shall be extended to the companies organized in Iowa and Minnesota if they choose to do so, and not be granted to the Union Pacific Railroad Company. It will be giving two companies in Iowa the same right that is granted in the old law and in this bill to the railroad company in Missouri owning the road from Hannibal to St. Joseph, and nothing more.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not object to this amendment myself; I only want to make a remark in reference to what the Senator from Iowa said yesterday, when he stated that Congress had adopted a principle that it could not authorize a company to build a railroad in a State. Congress has never yet authorized a corporation of a State to build a railroad in a Territory. This is as much a new feature as the other feature of the bill of which the Senator spoke yesterday. The Senator's amendment proposes to authorize two corporations created by States to build a railroad in a Territory where the United States have exclusive jurisdiction. I do not know that there is anything in the point, but I think if those State companies may be authorized by Congress to build a railroad in a Territory, Congress may at least authorize a company to build a railroad in a State.

Mr. HARLAN. The bill itself provides that the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, in the State of Missouri, may build a hundred miles of this road in the State of Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. But not in a Territory.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the difference?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is still worse.

Mr. HARLAN. That is, they cannot build a railroad in a Territory when they may build one in a State. It is supposed by some that Congress has jurisdiction over the Territories and may enact laws for the Territories, and modify laws now in existence in a Territory; and if Congress has that power, of course such a question as the Senator from Kansas suggests cannot be raised as to my amendment. But there are others who think that Congress has no right to organize a company to build a road in a State without the consent of the State. I respectfully differ, therefore, in opinion with the Senator from Kansas on this subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I only spoke of it as a new feature, not that I thought it unconstitutional or very objectionable. The Senator's objection to our amendment yesterday was on the ground of its being a new feature.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no doubt about the power of Congress to recognize a railroad charter, granted by a State, and to give it certain privileges and franchises in regard to the public lands in the Territories of the United States. I have not any question about that, and I make no such point. I think we have full and plenary power.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. HOWARD. My objection to this amendment is that it introduces into the bill a new feature that I do not fully understand, I confess. At the same time I am bound to say that the Senators who represent those States that are immediately concerned understand it much better than I do; and I shall throw no obstacle in the way of the adoption of this amendment if they see fit to urge it. I am a little afraid of it myself under the circumstances.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now move to amend section fifteen so as to conform to this amendment. Let the heading of the section, instead of reading "Omaha and Sioux City branches," read "Omaha branch."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made.

Mr. HARLAN. In line three, I move to strike out the words "single line of." That is a provision that does not pertain to any other branch road or to the main line, and I see no reason why it should pertain to the Omaha branch. If they desire to build a double-track railroad from Omaha to the hundredth meridian, it seems to me they ought to have the right to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the fifteenth section as I have marked it in red on the printed copy in my hand. The amendments are numerous, but merely as to phraseology, so as to make the section apply to the Omaha branch line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read.

The Secretary read:

In section fifteen, line eight, after the word "longitude," strike out "and whenever there shall be a line of railroad fully equipped through Minnesota or Iowa to Sioux City, on the Missouri river, said Union Pacific Railroad Company is hereby authorized and required to construct a railroad and telegraph from said Sioux City, upon the most direct and practicable route, to intersect and unite with the said railroad from said western boundary of Iowa, at such point thereon as the President of the United States shall fix, not further west than the said one hundredth meridian of longitude, and to construct the same at a rate of not less than one hundred miles each year, from and after the time when any such road shall be built through Minnesota or Iowa to said Sioux City as aforesaid."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa also moves further to amend the fifteenth section by striking out in line twenty-two the words "each of," and the letter "s" from the word "roads" in the same line. This amendment will be made. The next is on page 36, line thirty-seven, of the same section, after the words "applicable to said," to strike out the word "two" and the letter "s" from the word "roads;" and in the thirty-eighth line to strike out the words "or either of them," and "each of said," and the letter "s" from the word "roads;" and in line forty-one to strike out the word "first."

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to amend line six, section thirteen, page 30, after the word "thereof," by inserting "via Lawrence and Topeka." The company that is now building this road have located it within about two miles of each of those towns, and ask of the towns a large amount of money to make it to the towns. I desire to remind the Senate that Lawrence suffered a loss a few months since of $1,100,000, and that Topeka is the seat of government of our State. Those who are interested in the road here have conversed with me on the subject and have no objection to the amendment being inserted. I ask it in justice to those two towns and to the State that I represent in part.

Mr. HOWARD. I should be very glad to do anything in reason to indemnify the good people of Lawrence for the losses which they have recently sustained, but I take it that this is not exactly the occasion and form in which that is to be done; I hope therefore the amendment will not be adopted, as it would change the tenor and effect of the bill very much. It has not been the purpose of the committee to change the original routes as fixed by the act of 1862, leaving them all to stand precisely as before.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the object of my colleague will be accomplished if he only obliges the road to touch at the river opposite these points. The road is being built on the opposite side of the river; and if the amendment prevails it will oblige them to build on the opposite side of the river to that where they have now finished a part of the road. If the amendment of my colleague should prevail, the law would be that they begin on the south side of the Kansas river, extending the road by way of Lawrence and Topeka, which are both on the south side. In point of fact, the road is being built on the north side. The object of my colleague, I think, is a very good one; I am in favor of having these roads touch the river opposite those towns if they come up on the north side; but to oblige them to cross the river and go up on the other side, I think ought not to be done. That should be left to the company. Let them come up on which side they please. If my colleague will amend his amendment so as to have them touch the river opposite to these towns, I shall have no objection.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am perfectly willing to agree to that modification; it is all I desire; I am willing to have the road within a mile of the towns. I desire to say to the chairman of the committee that there is nothing in nature to prevent this company constructing the road opposite these two towns. The chairman seems to feel some sympathy for the town of Lawrence. We have had an application here for remuneration; but the Government is not now prepared to remunerate. I hope that this amendment will prevail. The result of the theory of the company will be this—and I desire the ear of the chairman of the committee when I state it—

Mr. HOWARD. Let me inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether this amendment of his will not necessitate the construction of two bridges across the river?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Not at all. I propose to amend it so as to read, "within a mile of either of the towns." The river is not more than an eighth of a mile across.

Mr. HOWARD. It seems to me we had better leave that matter to be regulated between the company and the citizens of those places. This whole subject was discussed, if I remember rightly, during the discussion of the original bill in 1862. This present bill does not vary in this respect from the act of 1862; it is the same thing; the committee thought it not best under the circumstances to alter it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I think the chairman does not understand me. This question was discussed in the committee, of which I was a member. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will recollect that it was fully discussed; but as the road was to follow the valley of the Kansas river, it was not deemed necessary to insert the names of these two towns, in the expectation, and the confident expectation on my part, that these two towns would be made points upon the road. Now, the object is to destroy—no, I will not say that; I do not know that that is the intention, but the result will be that Lawrence and Topeka must give bonds to the amount of two or three hundred thousand dollars, which they are unable to do, to obtain that which was intended by the committee at the session when the original bill was adopted. The result, however, will be this: if the two towns cannot raise this amount of bonds there will be rival towns built up two miles from each of them, and destroy them both. I called the attention of Senators to this subject some time since; and a letter was drawn up, signed by the Senators of this body, asking these contractors to make these two towns points upon the road; and it was signed, I believe, by thirty-eight members of this body. They have as yet failed to do it, although I have their written pledges here in my desk, pledging themselves to make these two towns points upon the road. They require these bonds. I have, I believe, two telegrams stating that the two towns would be made points on the road, in response to the letter to which I refer, signed by thirty-eight members of the Senate. I modify my amendment by saying "within one mile of Topeka and Lawrence."

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no feeling on this subject except that I desire to see all these roads built on the best possible ground that can be obtained. I desire also to have the line as straight as it can be. I of course know nothing about the facts stated by the Senator from Kansas. Personally, I really felt a very great desire, if it possibly can be done, to have this road go by the way of Lawrence, and I asked Mr. Hallett, who is or was for a time the president of the company, some time ago, if it could be carried by the town of Lawrence, and he said to me that it would deviate from a right line very considerably, and would cost the company an immense sum of money to do so, and that it ought not to be constructed by the way of Lawrence. I of course know personally nothing in regard to it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator is doing a great injustice to Mr. Hallett, or he has done great injustice to himself, for, as I have stated here, I have his letters and telegrams—

Mr. HENDERSON. You did not state that they were from Mr. Hallett.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I state now that I have Mr. Hallett's letters and telegrams pledging me in the most emphatic terms that he would make these two towns points on the road. I am, of course, as well acquainted with the land opposite those two towns as I am with this Capitol or the Senate Chamber, and I say here that there is nothing in nature to prevent the road running opposite these two towns.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senator how far the line of the contemplated road, as at present surveyed, is from the river opposite to Lawrence?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Two and a quarter miles.

Mr. HENDERSON. How far is it from Topeka?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. About the same distance, but perhaps not quite as much.

Mr. HENDERSON. As I stated before, I have no interest or feeling about this thing. If this road can be carried by Lawrence or by Topeka as well as by some other line, it would be my desire to see it pass by those towns. Of course it cannot touch the towns, because the road is being constructed on the north side of the river, and, as has been stated, the two towns are on the south bank of the river. In reality, the road will be no more serviceable to the two towns by touching the river, or passing along upon the river right opposite to them, in sight of them, than it would be two miles away. I cannot conceive what additional advantage it would be to them to have it immediately upon the bank of the river. But, sir, why not in all this matter let the actual survey determine the line of the road? I would not be in favor of permitting a company to impose upon any town on the line of the road; but it seems to me that the true interest of the company would dictate the policy of building the road where there would be the fewest number of curves, where the curves would not be so great, and upon a line of road where the surface of the ground would enable them to build it cheapest. In all this matter connected with the building of the Pacific railroad my policy has been to let actual survey determine; and I am sure that if actual survey carries this road by either of these two points no man will be more highly gratified than myself. Indeed it seems to me that a company building a road, if they can carry it by the way of a large flourishing town where there is a trade, would certainly carry it there. There is every inducement in the world for them to deviate from a right line if they can possibly do so; but in working a great road like this how important it is that it shall be a straight line.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. That is the case generally, but the Senator will bear in mind that this company owns the land opposite Lawrence.

Mr. HENDERSON. Which company?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This railroad company owns the land opposite Lawrence.

Mr. POMEROY. If my colleague will accept my amendment to his amendment, we can take a vote on it and close the question on it at once, I have no doubt.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. That I have accepted. The object of this detour from Lawrence is to build up a town on the land of the company and destroy Lawrence.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] will hardly take the vote until I have yielded the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought the Senator had concluded his remarks.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator is evidently tired of me, and I will yield the floor so that he can offer his amendment and let his colleague accept it. It is highly important that we should not take up time. I have not spent the time; the Senator has been on the floor to-day twenty-five times in regard to this bill; I have not opened my mouth on it before.

Mr. MORGAN. I now renew my motion for an executive session.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope not. I hope we shall get a vote on this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to state that I have several amendments to offer to this bill, and I desire further to say that I am unwilling now to vote on this bill since the numerous amendments which have been adopted to-day until there is a reprint of it, so that I can see what has been adopted. I do not wish to take any time, but I would like, since these various amendments have been adopted, to see the bill as it stands. It is a bill of very great importance to my State, and I have spent none of the time of the Senate in regard to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is of importance. The amendments of the Senate ought to be ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the permission of the Senator from New York, I will move that the bill with the amendments adopted up to this time be printed.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope if that course is to be taken that the amendments now prepared to be offered will first be allowed to be voted upon.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CONNESS. Let a vote be taken on the pending amendment at any rate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I must insist on my motion. There are a great many amendments to be offered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think on Saturday night we might take a little bit of rest, and I move that the Senate adjourn. [Oh, no!]

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the Senator to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly, if the Senator from Maryland asks it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Before the question is put on the motion to go into executive session I will state to the Senate why I think an executive session should be held. One of the officers who distinguished himself with great gallantry in the late battle was very severely wounded as it has turned out in point of fact, but his gallantry was so conspicuous that his promotion has been recommended by the President, and I heard with great regret about an hour since that his wound is likely to prove fatal; and under these circumstances I am sure it will be gratifying to him, and of course be very gratifying to the Senate personally, that his nomination should be confirmed. I hope, therefore, the motion will be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and
The Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 23, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, a list of all general officers of the regular and volunteer forces in commission at the beginning of the present war, or appointed since, with the States in which they were born and from which they were appointed; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of men and women of Mason county, Illinois, praying for the abolition of slavery, and that the Constitution may be so amended as to forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. HARLAN presented five petitions of men and women of Iowa, praying for the abolition of slavery, and that the Constitution may be so amended as to forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. HALE presented the memorial of J. Brown, jr., of New York, praying for additional compensation for services rendered as an artist with the naval expedition under Commodore Perry to Japan; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILKINSON presented a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in relation to the condition of the Wea, Peoria, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians, and recommending an appropriation for their relief; which was ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILKINSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 219) for the relief of the Wea, Peoria, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians, of Kansas, reported it with an amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 286) to prohibit the discharge of persons from liability to military duty by reason of the payment of money; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

TRANSPORTATION OF SUPPLIES.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to report to the Senate the amount estimated for this current year to be paid for transporting Government supplies from Platte country railroad to Fort Leavenworth, and from the latter point via Fort Kearney and Fort Riley westwardly. If the amounts are not estimated for to furnish his opinion of the probable sums to be expended.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announcing that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 21st instant an act (S. No. 267) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

NAVAL SUPPLIES.

Mr. GRIMES. There seems to be very little business to be done this morning, and there is a special order set for one o'clock, on which I propose to address the Senate for a short time. If it be agreeable to the Senate, I will move that that be taken up at this time, and I will proceed now with my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that that bill being postponed until one o'clock, it will not be reached by a motion of that kind; but by unanimous consent the Senate may consider it now.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to have the bill to establish a line of mail steamers to Brazil considered at the present time. It was laid over a few days ago, and I should like to finish it this morning. The bill to which the gentleman from Iowa refers, I understand, is the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. GRIMES. It is the special order, but the unfinished business of Saturday will cut me off—that is, the Pacific railroad bill—unless I can anticipate it.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator from Iowa will be allowed to proceed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the proposition, if there be no objection.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will not make any objection.

Mr. HALE. I will not make any objection, with a single proviso. The subject upon which the Senator from Iowa desires to address the Senate is upon a report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs, or, as he says, by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which renders it proper that I should have an opportunity to reply to his speech. I shall probably want to reply to it, and I shall want to reply to it as soon as he is done. If the bill is taken up now before the hour fixed for the assignment, the Senator will probably occupy until about one o'clock, and I shall be cut off from replying. If it is taken up with the understanding that the Pacific railroad bill may be postponed until I can have an opportunity of replying to the Senator's speech, I have no objection to its being taken up; but if there cannot be such an understanding as that I must object, because when the Senator makes his speech upon that report I want to have the privilege of answering it, and answering it at the time. If that arrangement can be entered into, I am perfectly willing and anxious that it should be taken up now; but if not, if the Senator is to occupy three quarters of an hour and I am to be cut off by the special order, and thus prevented from replying to it, I will object.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope there will be an opportunity furnished to the Senator to reply. I shall not occupy a very long period. I cannot say how long exactly, but not very long.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to enter into any such agreement. I am entirely willing to extend any courtesy in my power to the gentleman from Iowa or the gentleman from New Hampshire; but I do not wish to see the order of the day thrown out of its position. I wish to have it come up in its regular order, and that we may proceed to finish it to-day if possible. If it were possible to foresee how long the Senators would occupy in the discussion to which reference is made, I might form some judgment of it; but as that is not possible, I cannot enter into any agreement now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection made to the motion of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CONNESS. I shall object, sir, if it be a part of the arrangement or understanding that the Senator from New Hampshire is to reply immediately. I do not understand why the Senator from New Hampshire should attach that as a part of the arrangement.

Mr. COLLAMER. As that arrangement does not seem likely to be made, I believe I must call up the bill to which I have referred providing for a line of steamers to Brazil.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands objection to be made by the Senator from California.

Mr. GRIMES, (to Mr. CONNESS.) Let him reply.

Mr. CONNESS. It is postponing the Pacific railroad bill, and that should not give way to personal matters, I think.

Mr. GRIMES. What I have to say is not personal matter.

Mr. CONNESS. It is going to wear that appearance before we get through with it. I do not like to object to the Senator's speaking, because he has notified the Senate that he would speak to-day on this subject; but it appears to me it is carrying it too far to allow a debate of this kind to go on and occupy the day to the injury of the public business.

Mr. COLLAMER. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 407.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont object to the motion of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that it is objected to.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to it.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw my objection, with this understanding, that if the debate is prolonged too far, we will call for the special order.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then I will not stand in the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the motion of the Senator from Iowa, and the bill which was made the special order, by special assignment, for one o'clock to-day is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 165) in relation to naval supplies.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, on the 14th of March last I had the honor to submit to the Senate "a bill in relation to naval supplies," which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. On the 7th of April following the committee reported it back to the Senate, with the recommendation "that the bill do not pass." In their written report the committee say:

"The bill proposes a total and radical change in the mode of purchasing naval supplies at one blow, and overthrowing and entirely abolishing a system which has been in operation for more than half a century."

They also say:

"The system sought to be overthrown has been in operation, as before stated, for more than half a century, and, in the opinion of your committee, has operated well, and is well calculated to effect the object sought to be attained, namely, supplying the Navy at reasonable prices with the best articles demanded for the service."

"The committee are not aware of any inconveniences to the service by the operation of the present system that can be remedied, or even ameliorated, by the proposed change."

I shall endeavor to show, first, what the present system is which has been thus unhesitatingly and unqualifiedly indorsed by the Naval Committee of this body; and how, in their language, it "is well calculated to effect the object sought to be attained, namely, supplying the Navy at reasonable prices with the best articles demanded for the service;" and, second, to point out the remedies that I think should be applied to correct the evils believed to exist in the present system. In order to do this satisfactorily I must first show what the system has been as well as what it is now.

Prior to the establishment of the Navy Department under the act of Congress of April 30, 1798, and from that time until 1802, this branch of the public service as well as the Army was supplied by officers known as purveyors of public supplies. These officers were required by the act of February 23, 1795, under which they were appointed, "under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury to conduct the procuring and providing of all arms, military and naval stores, provisions, clothing, Indian goods, and generally all articles of supply requisite for the service of the United States." They were officers of the Treasury, without military rank or responsibility. By the act of March 16, 1802, chapter nine, military agents were created who were required "to purchase, receive, and forward to their proper destination all military stores and all articles for the troops in their respective departments, and all goods and annuities for the Indians, which they may be directed to purchase, or which may be ordered into their care by the Department of War." It would seem that the provisions of this act contravened the act of 1795, and that the relations of the purveyor of public supplies with the War Department thereupon ceased, although the act of 1795 was not in terms repealed. It will be observed that the military agents created by the last-named act of Congress were also civil officers, and therefore subject to no military responsibility. The evils resulting from a system that gave no military control over and created no military subordination among the supply officers of the Army soon became so apparent and intolerable that Congress applied the remedy by the act of March 28, 1812, when the quartermaster and commissary departments of the Army were created. Then for the first time the supply agents of the Army became military officers, bearing commissions, and subject to the rules and articles of war. By this act also the office of purveyor of public supplies was abolished in terms.

While these changes were taking place in regard to furnishing supplies to the Army, the matter of supplying the Navy seemed to attract very little attention. Experience had everywhere demonstrated the absolute necessity for military control over such officers, and Congress, recognizing that necessity, established it so far as the Army was concerned, but took no action whatever in relation to the supply officers of the Navy. Why this distinction was made it is impossible to conjecture, unless it arose from the comparative insignificance of our Navy at that time, and the consequent small amount of supplies required for its support.

Answering to and corresponding with the quartermasters and commissaries of the Army are the Navy agents and naval storekeepers in the Navy. As the quartermasters and commissaries are the purchasing agents and depositaries of supplies for the Army, so are the Navy agents and naval storekeepers the purchasing agents and depositaries of supplies for the Navy.

It is impossible to discover the precise time at which Navy agents were first known in our service. They were originally mere temporary agents appointed by the head of the Department for the performance of a specific duty, and probably sprang up after the abolition of the office of purveyor of public supplies and the creation of military agents. They were recognized for the first time by law as in legal existence by the act of May 15, 1820, in which it is declared that certain enumerated officers to be appointed under the laws of the United States, and among them Navy agents, "shall be appointed for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure." Navy agents and naval storekeepers are and always have been civil appointees; that is to say, they have for forty years been selected from the political friends of the dominant party, through the influence of politicians residing in the States where the navy-yards were established, and selected, not because of their eminent qualifications, but because they have been experienced merchants, but because of the personal and party services they have rendered or have been expected to render to some prominent politician in the neighborhood. Every change in the domination of political parties has produced a change of these officers.

Now, let us look at the present system of supplying the Navy Department, examine the duties that Navy agents and naval storekeepers are required to perform, and ascertain how they discharge those duties.

Some time before the beginning of each fiscal year each bureau of the Navy Department makes out a schedule of the various articles and the amounts of each that will probably be required during the year at each navy-yard. To inform themselves on this subject the chiefs of the bureaus call upon the commandant of each yard to furnish this information, so far as it relates to the yard under his charge. At each yard are an engineer and a master-workman for each description of work done at the yard, as, for example, master blacksmiths, master carpenters, master painters, master boat-builders, master rope-workers, &c., &c. These master mechanics are also political appointees, holding their offices at the instance and during the pleasure of some prominent politician, and generally in the interest of some contractor. With a political change in the national administration they also are all swept out of office, and their places supplied by new men hungry for place and money, the only merit of many of them consisting in their fidelity to the political fortunes of some member of Congress. Nine tenths of all of the clamors that have at various times been raised against the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks has proceeded from the fact that he, having the general supervision of such appointments, has attempted to retain the services of some of the most experienced and honest master mechanics in the yards.

When the commandant receives the order from the Navy Department to report the probable wants of his yard he at once refers the matter to the various master mechanics, and requires them to furnish schedules of the articles and the amount of each article that will be required by each of their departments in the yard. The master mechanics report the wants of the yard in what the law terms "classes," i. e., the various kinds of iron are embraced in different classes, hardware in another, lumber of various kinds in others, and so on until all of the anticipated wants of the yard are reported to the commandant and through him to the Navy Department at Washington. The award of the contract is made to the lowest aggregate bid for the articles embraced in the class. It will be readily perceived how easy it has always been for one of the professional contractors, who abound about the yards, and who is in collusion with the master-workmen, to defraud the Government under this system. The contractor, through the influence of a friendly politician, secures the appointment of his tool as a master mechanic at a yard where he designs to conduct his operations. This master mechanic thus appointed furnishes to the commandant of the yard a schedule of the articles which he says will be wanted in his department. In this schedule will be included many articles of which the master mechanic well knows there will be but small amounts if any needed, but of which he will represent that large amounts will be required.

The honest contractor who is not in the secret of the fraud will bid upon each of those articles the price at which they can be reasonably furnished; while the dishonest one, being in the secret, and knowing that little if any of some articles will be called for, and knowing which those articles are, bids for them a merely nominal sum. While this master mechanic thus estimates for some articles which the contractor is not really expected to furnish, he at the same time and in the same "class" estimates for very small amounts of such articles as are of prime necessity, and of which large quantities will be required. In this way the aggregate of the bid of the dishonest contractor being much below the aggregate bid of the honest one, who is not in collusion with the Government employe, he has received the contract, and thus honest men have been driven away from competing with the knaves.

It should be borne in mind also that the contracts have always contained a provision declaring that "if additional quantities, not exceeding twice the amount of the articles named in the contract be demanded, they shall be furnished on like terms and conditions" with those specified in the contract.

The working of this system can be best illustrated by copies of bids upon which contracts have been awarded, taken from the public files of the Navy Department. I have selected those which I shall read because the particular contractors named have carried nominal bidding to a greater extent than any contractors that I know, and because they make great professions of mercantile integrity. They have even published two pamphlets in part to convince the public that they were justified in resorting to this flagitious practice of fictitious bids because others had done so or would do so. Indeed, they make the extraordinary pretension of being great reformers of abuses, but their virtuous zeal for reformation did not extend so far as to lead them to recommend the rejection of nominal bids; for those who have read the letter of Mr. Franklin W. Smith to Hon. Charles B. Sedgwick, under date of February 10, 1863, have observed that Mr. Smith recommends "the omission" from the act of 3d March, 1863, "of the clause allowing the rejection of bids for nominal prices, because if the quantities are fixed, as above mentioned, there can be no fictitious bids."

The first bid I read is that of Smith Brothers & Foster, of 4th June, 1861, for pig iron. The market price for American iron at that time was eighteen dollars per ton, and for Scotch iron was twenty-one to twenty-three dollars per ton:

Smith Brothers & Foster. Date of Contract June 4, 1861.
Class No. 13—Pig Iron. Miscellaneous.

Bid.	Deliveries.
20 tons (2,240 pounds) Scotch pig iron, at $1 per ton, 9 tons.....	$9
20 tons (2,240 pounds) American pig iron, at $31 per ton, 87 tons.....	2,697
Total .....	$2,706

They proposed to furnish twenty tons of American pig iron when the market price was $18 a ton according to the price-current of that month at $31 a ton, and the Scotch pig the market price of which was $21 to $23 per ton, at $1 per ton. Of the Scotch pig at $1 per ton only nine tons were ever delivered, while of the American pig at the exorbitant price of $31 per ton there were eighty-seven tons delivered, or more than five times the amount contracted for. Will any one say that this transaction furnishes no evidence of collusion between the contractors and the parties who made the estimates and the requisitions?

But it is said that Smith Brothers & Foster were compelled to bid thus in order to secure the contract, and because other contractors did the same thing. They contend that they were justified in following the multitude to do evil. Let that question be determined by the offers of their competitors, some of whom, at any rate, judging from their bids, were honest men. The bids for this class were:

Schedule.	20 tons (2,240 lbs.) Scotch pig iron.....	20 tons (2,240 lbs.) American pig iron.....
Smith Brothers & Foster.	$1	31
J. R. Elvans.	$45	25
W. E. Coffin & Co.	$25	25
N. W. Coffin.	$25 00	24 75
H. J. Collins & Co.	$32	50
Tilton, Wheelwright & Co.	$23 50	29 50
William Lang.	$28	28
Oakman & Eldredge.	$23 50	24 00
E. R. Tucker.	$25	30
E. H. Castle.	$25	25

The next bid I read was made by Smith Brothers & Co., the same individuals that composed the firm of Smith Brothers & Foster, for class thirteen; also American and Scotch pig iron, and is as follows:

Smith Brothers & Co. Date of Contract October 14, 1861.
Class No. 13—Pig Iron. Miscellaneous.

Bid.	Deliveries.
170 tons (2,240 pounds) American pig iron, at $30 per ton, 295 1219-2240 tons.....	$8,866 32
80 tons (2,240 pounds) Scotch pig iron, at $1 per ton, 9 2125-2240 tons.....	9 95
	$8,876 27

Here it will be observed that there were eighty tons of Scotch iron contracted for at one dollar per ton, of which only about ten tons were delivered, and one hundred and seventy tons of American pig at thirty dollars per ton, and two hundred and ninety-five and one half tons delivered. Let those who desire to know how substantial the defense is that if this robbery had not been perpetrated by these contractors it would have been by others, examine the list of their competitors and their bids, and then calculate for themselves the loss to the Government by the nominal bidding of houses of "high mercantile integrity." Compare the amount of Scotch iron contracted for and its price; compare the amount of it called for at one dollar a ton with the amount called for of American iron at thirty dollars, and then tell me whether there is any evidence of collusion between contractors and the employes of the Government. The bids for this class were:

Schedule.
170 tons (2,240 lbs.) Amer- ican pig iron.....	$30	Smith Brothers & Co.
80 tons (2,240 lbs.) Scotch pig iron.....	$45	Peter Townsend.
	$35	William Henshaw.
	$25	Oakman & Eldredge.
	$22 50	E. P. Dwight.
	$24 50	William Lang.
	$23 80	N. W. Coffin.
	$20	W. B. Russell.
	$20 00	E. R. Tinker.
	$25	J. R. Evans.
	$28	Tilton, Wheelwright & Co.

On the 9th of October, 1862, Smith Brothers & Co. entered into contract with the Bureau of Yards and Docks for the supply of pig iron for the Boston yard. Their bid and deliveries were as follows:

Schedule.		Bid.	Average of bid.	Deliveries.
20 tons (2,240 lbs.) Scotch pig iron.....	$1	$20	10 130-2240	$10 00
50 tons (2,240 lbs.) American pig, anthracite, No. 1.....	36	1,500	85	3,006 00
35 tons (2,240 lbs.) American pig, anthracite, No. 2.....	20	300	15	300 00
10 tons (2,240 lbs.) American pig, charcoal, No. 1.....	20	200	3	60 00
10 tons (2,240 lbs.) American pig, charcoal, No. 2.....	10	100	2	20 00
115		$22,650	116 130-2240	$2,188 06

The average cost to Government of the iron delivered was thirty dollars per ton, worth in the market about twenty dollars, being an excess of ten dollars per ton on one hundred and sixteen tons or a clear profit over and above the market price of $1,160.

I might illustrate by many other contracts made with this firm of Smith Brothers & Co., more enormously fraudulent, if possible, than these I have read, but these must suffice. I might also illustrate by reference to similar fraudulent bids and contracts, based upon the bids of H. D. Stoon, H. J. Collins & Co., C. N. Scofield & Co., J. L. Savage & Co., and other contractors, but the facts in regard to those cases will be sufficiently explained, I apprehend, in the testimony of Franklin W. Smith, of the firm of Smith Brothers & Co., before a select committee of this body. Mr. Smith describes, in his evidence, with great particularity the mote in the eye of his brother contractors, but fails to remark upon the beam in his own eye. I have attempted to supply the omission.

Mr. President, I know no stronger testimony that could be afforded of the demoralizing tendency of the naval contract system than is exhibited by the case I have presented. A mercantile firm, professing to have a respectable standing in the community where it does business, even boasting of its reputation for commercial integrity, resorts to the practice of fictitious bidding, and resorts to it systematically. For the sake of securing a contract for lumber they propose to deliver the best quality of pine shingles at $1 per thousand, and white pine boards at $40 per thousand; No. 2 three-inch white pine plank for $5; and No. 2 two-inch white pine plank for $30 per thousand. For the sake of securing a contract for lead they agree to furnish 5,000 pounds of pig lead at 1 cent per pound, and 15,000 pounds of shot lead at 15 cents per pound, when the current market price was 8 1/2 cents, of which latter kind of lead they deliver 30,000 pounds, and tendered to the Government and tried to force the Department to accept upon this latter bid 186,000 pounds at 15 cents per pound. When, I say, this firm had reduced fictitious bidding to a science, and had reaped the present personal advantages resulting from it, when required by the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks to make deliveries upon their fictitious bids at once decline to do so, deny the power of the Department to enforce such deliveries, and become indignantly virtuous on the subject of naval contracts.

It is not an agreeable duty, Mr. President, to speak of any one as I am compelled to speak of this firm. But when men sit down and, according to their own admissions, make nice mathematical calculations to determine how they can excel their neighbors in their efforts to defraud the Government, and, when detected and rebuked by the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks for their conduct, are swift to bear testimony against their associates in frauds, and begin to prate of their own patriotism and honesty, and to declare in their publications that "at a time when our Government is engaged in an exhaustive struggle for life" they "have been compelled as citizens to urge its protection against unfaithfulness in its service and fraud by those enjoying its patronage," it has seemed to me that they should be held up to the reprehension of honest men. Why did they not come to Congress and expose the frauds? Why did they not "cry aloud and spare not" until the evil complained of was corrected? Did they ever address the Department or Congress on this subject? Did they suppose we would be indifferent to this great wrong? Was it necessary to the public interests or to their own reputations that they should be partakers in the wickedness and enjoy its gains?

So much, Mr. President, of the system of fictitious bidding of which Smith Brothers & Co., of Boston, have been the great apostles.

The last Congress sought to ameliorate some of the evils existing in the naval contract system by declaring in the act of March 3, 1863, "that every contract shall require the delivery of a specified quantity, and no bids having nominal or fictitious prices shall be considered." But the effort was futile. The great fundamental evils in the civil administration of the supply system and the method of making appointments in the yards, without any responsibility, military or otherwise, on the part of the employe. You may denounce as much as you please the fraudulent transactions occurring at all of our yards, but you will accomplish nothing until you create a responsibility on the part of every man in your service that shall be speedy, efficient, severe.

Notwithstanding the efforts of the Navy Department to secure full estimates of the probable wants of the service during the next ensuing fiscal year, and to advertise for the supplies that will thus be needed, a large part of the naval supplies for the Bureaus of Yards and Docks, Engineering, Construction and Equipment, are bought in open market without advertisement and at private sale by the respective Navy agents. Especially has this been the case since the commencement of this war, for the demand has been such, arising from the exigencies of the public service, as no human foresight could foretell. In order to throw some restraint around and some check upon the Navy agents who were to exercise this great power of purchasing large values of property, without public notice and of whomsoever they pleased, the Department issued the following order in 1855, which is unrevoked and stands as a departmental regulation to-day:

[Circular.]

BUREAU YARDS AND DOCKS,
December 29, 1855.

SIR: I am directed by the Secretary of the Navy to issue this circular, which supersedes that of the 8th of June last, and which by his order is to apply to all the bureaus of the Navy Department.

When articles are required for one of the bureaus of this Department which are not embraced in contracts with that bureau, or which are to be procured by open purchase, the Navy agent will ascertain in writing from the contractors with all the bureaus dealing in the kind of articles required, or from their agents, if any near the place of delivery, the prices at which they will respectively deliver the articles required.

He will also ascertain from at least two other parties dealing in such articles, including the one, if any, named in the requisition, the prices at which they will deliver them as required. All the parties and their prices are to be noted on the back of the requisition, and the purchase made from the lowest bidder, subject to the usual inspection.

The commandant will take care not to approve requisitions for articles to be procured by open purchase when similar articles under contract or in store can be made to answer the purpose of those required.

When open purchases are indispensable, let at least a month's supply be included in one requisition, unless otherwise specially directed by either bureau.

When the prices are the same, the contractors are always to have the preference.

A bill of the articles purchased, with the cost price of each, must in all cases accompany the goods when delivered.

Respectfully, your obedient servant.

JOSEPH SMITH.

C. SWACKHAMER, Esq., Navy Agent, New York.

At the time this circular was issued, honest contractors had not been driven entirely away from the competition sought by the Government, and fictitious bidding had not been reduced to a science. If the instructions contained in it were obeyed, if the Navy agents would "ascertain in writing from the contractors with the bureaus dealing in the kind of articles required, or from their agents, if any near the place of delivery, the prices at which they will respectively furnish the articles required," and if they would "also ascertain from at least two other parties dealing in such articles, including the one, if any, named in the requisition, the prices at which they will deliver them as required, all the parties and their prices noted on the back of the requisition, and the purchase made from the lowest bidder, subject to the usual inspection," the interests of the Government would be measurably protected. But the Navy agents either wholly neglect to obey or they evade the regulation, and how can obedience be enforced? In no manner that I am aware of.

Let me illustrate the method in which these open purchases are made: if an additional quantity of iron, steel, cordage, or any other article not provided for by contract, is wanted, a report is made by the storekeeper of the yard to the Navy agent, with an indorsement thereon of the commandant of the yard, who accepts the statement of the storekeeper as facts. The Navy agent thereupon issues a requisition or order directing the person to whom it is sent, and he directs it to be sent to whomsoever he pleases, to purchase and deliver the articles named in the requisition at the navy-yard, subject to inspection there. The articles thus delivered at the yard are inspected by some one of the employes, who is usually an instrument of the contractor and Navy agent; the contractor then presents his bills in triplicate, which, being approved by the commandant on the strength of the inspection certificate, are paid by the Navy agent.

It should be borne in mind, too, that these requisitions are not directed to dealers in the articles wanted, but to some middle-man, or contractor, who, after receiving the order from the Navy agent, goes into the market and buys at his own price of the legitimate and regular dealers; and the articles are sent direct from the warehouses of the first vendors to the navy-yard, the contractors not being to the expense even of storage. The Navy reports show that such contractors as Smith Brothers & Co. and C. W. Scofield & Co., whose regular business is that of dealing in hardware, have, under this system, furnished to the Navy Department firewood, lumber, lime, hair, plaster, iron, nails, hard ware, paints, glass, ship-chandlery, charcoal, oils, belting, staves, packing, leather hose, stoves, cooking utensils, tin, and copper. In Philadelphia, among the principal furnishers of goods to the Government upon the requisitions of the Navy agent are Nobilit, Brown & Nobilit, cabinet-makers, who furnish spelter, port-lights, glue, chalk, life-preservers, sheathing felt, yellow metal, copper-wire, asphaltum, Japan dryers' oil, leather, screw-bolts, and iron chains; and D. B. Dieterich, dealer in India-rubber goods, who furnishes hardware, lime, sheet-hemp, hose, gas pipe, glass, whiting, wire rope, gun gaskets, buff leather, cut nails, coffee boxes, block tin, pig lead, tarred paper, &c.

Those who have taken the trouble to examine the subject have discovered that what I have already said of master-workmen and employes in the yards is true also of the contractors. There is a change of contractors just as regularly as there is a political change in the national Administration. No matter what may be the professed political opinions of either Navy agents or contractors, it will be invariably found that the agents and the great leading contractors are in perfect personal accord. Referring to the published schedule of contractors attached to the annual reports of the Secretary of the Navy, it will be discovered that the names of the principal contractors since 1861 are new to the report. They have been brought into prominence by the new Navy agents and the political influences that are behind both. Smith Brothers & Co. only became contractors in 1861, and since that time have been paid upon their contracts $1,010,582 93. H. D. Stover, a comparatively new name in the Navy Department, has in the same time received $1,023,138 93. C. W. Scofield & Co., of New York, began their contracts at the same time and have been paid $1,152,214 99, and Trickey & Jowett, a firm composed of a citizen of New Hampshire and a citizen of Maine, only began to contract in 1862, and have already received for lumber, hay, and provender, delivered at the Kittery and Charlestown navy-yards, $1,383,650 32, with large deliveries and payments yet to be made upon their contracts. It is not a difficult thing, Mr. President, to denounce one's adversaries, whether real or imaginary, for frauds or for profligate expenditures, but it does doubtless require the exercise of some public virtue to assist in breaking up a system by which one's friends are gorging themselves with public plunder.

And now, Mr. President, to show that the prohibition of nominal bids has been of no advantage to the Government, and can be of none so long as there can be collusion between the Navy agents and contractors, or between contractors and master mechanics and inspectors, without a prompt responsibility and as prompt a punishment, I will illustrate by a few examples.

As already stated, one of the principal contracting firms at the New York yard is C. W. Scofield & Co. A very large part of their deliveries to the Government were made upon what are called open purchases; that is to say, upon orders from the Navy agent at New York directing them to deliver to the naval storekeeper at the yard these certain specified articles. These orders contain no allusion to the price to be paid, no memorandum of the market value of the articles, and no offers from dealers in similar articles, or certificates of value from dealers, as required by the departmental circular of December 29, 1855. Now, it so happens that the books of C. W. Scofield & Co. are in the hands of an agent of the Government, and from these books, kept by themselves, the following statement has been prepared. It will be observed that the first column contains the cost price of the articles named and the last column the price at which the same articles were turned over to the Government:

I am told, Mr. President, that these are by no means the most flagrant cases of robbery exhibited by the books of Scofield & Co., and are not the basis of the charges upon which the members of that firm are now being tried before a naval court-martial. And yet we are gravely told by the Naval Committee of the Senate, in their report, that the system under which this sort of robbery can be perpetrated with impunity "has been in operation more than half a century, and, in the opinion of your committee, has operated well, and is well calculated to effect the object sought to be attained, namely, supplying the Navy at reasonable prices with the best articles demanded for the public service!"

I hold in my hand a table showing the amount of oils delivered at the New York navy-yard during the last two years, the date of delivery, the price at which it was furnished to the Government, and the market price of the article at the time the delivery was made, as compiled by an intelligent and reliable merchant. These invoices of oils were mostly secured upon open purchases upon the requisition of the Navy agent, and turned out to be, in most cases, adulterated by the admixture of oils of an inferior quality, although invariably to be of the best quality known in the market. [See table referred to at the foot of next page.]

The Senate will obtain a very correct idea of the manner in which the naval supply system is conducted in New York, our most important navy-yard, from the extracts of a letter from Nathaniel Wilson, Esq., to the Secretary of the Navy, under date of May 12, 1864. Mr. Wilson is a most intelligent and reliable authority, and is the special counsel of the Navy Department in investigating frauds committed in New York. It must be borne in mind that the inspector spoken of by Mr. Wilson is an officer appointed by the commandant of the yard, and is not an officer created by law.

"I have proof that from fifty to seventy-five per cent., exclusive of provisions and clothing, of all the open purchases for the Brooklyn navy-yard during the last year were made through the house of C. W. Scofield & Co. I have heretofore stated that a justification for the course pursued is sought by the Navy agent in the circulars from the Department relative to the preference to be given to contractors in the distribution of orders for goods at open purchase. I now call your attention to another explanation. It is alleged that very many of the most respectable merchants of New York decline to sell directly to the Government because of the disappointments and delays to which they are subjected in the payment of bills. It is stated that there are difficulties and detentions in obtaining the approval of bills at the navy-yard, and that there is further trouble and tardiness in procuring the money due for goods delivered, upon bills approved, from the Treasury through the Navy agent. These reasons, it is said, deter merchants from selling their goods to the Government, and cause those who do sell to charge higher figures than any private person would be expected or would be willing to pay.

"Undoubtedly the causes I have mentioned have had considerable effect in excluding merchants of the better class from the lists of those who sell to the Navy Department. The delay referred to is partially necessarily incident to the system which substitutes for one direct, responsible head a score or more of subordinates, through whose hands the goods and bills must pass on their tedious and uncertain journey to the Navy agent, and partially it is the creation of the very persons who have secured so large a share of the open purchases in New York. I know of one instance in which one of the party distinctly expressed an intention of preventing a competing contractor from obtaining his money promptly, and succeeded in his effort.

"The difficulties recited, and that were so serious that other merchants could not successfully encounter them, were avoided by Messrs. Scofield & Co. in the following manner: first, by the payment of five or six hundred dollars to a young man employed in the storekeeper's department in the navy-yard, they secured immediate attention to the goods delivered by them, and the prompt passage of their bills through the official routine. With these in their possession they borrowed large sums of money of the Navy agent, and left with him in many instances their bills as collateral security. They thus had advantages that fairer traders were not possessed of. These facilities they used with no sparing hand, despite the remonstrances made by the inspector at the yard, to the Navy agent; and with the consequences of their indulgence you are familiar.

"Concerning the prices that have been charged for goods obtained at open purchase, the only limit that has been placed upon them is the action and vigilance of the inspector at the navy yard. If it is the theory of the law and your expectation and belief, that the Navy agent as a skillful and experienced merchant makes the bargains as to the qualities and prices of goods to be bought, then the Navy agent's definition of his offices and duties is quite the opposite of that theory, and must disappoint your expectation. He regards the office as one primarily for the disbursement of money, and declares that the immense increase of business and the vagueness of the requisitions made upon him make it absolutely impossible for him to make bargains and agreements as to the prices of things before they are delivered to the yard, and he unhesitatingly places the responsibility of correctness as to quality and price upon the inspector.

"Practically the only labor performed by the Navy agent in making the purchases is the mere sending of orders, with no agreement as to price, to such persons as he may elect, and the payment of bills when they are presented. Whatever of financial sagacity, whatever of trained mercantile skill the laws or the policy of the Department expect to find and to use in the efforts of the Navy agent in making bargains for supplies, it is confessedly evident that neither the one nor the other have been called into practical service. "What would be thought of the skill or prudence of a merchant who on one day would receive varnish at the rate of one dollar per gallon, under contract, costing and worth but eighty cents per gallon, and who would on the same day receive, from the same parties, the same quality of varnish, and pay for it $3 50 per gallon? Yet such instances are of frequent occurrence in the history of the transactions of the Brooklyn navy-yard. You will understand that I state no fictitious cases, but only such as I have examined, and the very fact that such cases have happened presents to my judgment the most convincing proof of the evils and imperfections of the present system. The responsibilities and duties of inspection are divided among so many persons, and there is such a wide discrepancy between the duties that by law and regulation are devolved upon the Navy agent, and the labor the Navy agent feels himself called upon to perform and does actually perform, that it is quite in vain to expect economy and efficiency without a change in the law or in the estimate of official duty entertained by the Navy agent."

"The statement I have made is not as complete as I would wish it to be, but you may trust that there is nothing in it unreliable. I have confined myself to a statement of the practice prevailing rather than to particular illustrations."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORGAN in the chair.) The hour having arrived for the consideration of the special order, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Saturday.

Mr. FOOT. I suggest, and I presume it will meet the unanimous concurrence of the Senate, that the special order be passed over for the time being, until the Senator from Iowa shall have concluded his remarks. It is a courtesy that is always extended by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I know it is; but I shall ask the same courtesy, to be allowed to reply to him.

Mr. HOWARD. Let the special order be passed over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be considered the sense of the Senate, if there be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. Need I remind the Senate that the system of which Mr. Wilson thus speaks is the same system which the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs declares "has been in operation" "more than half a century, and in the opinion of your committee has operated well, and is well calculated to effect the object sought to be attained, namely, supplying the Navy at reasonable prices with the best articles demanded for the public service?"

Any one can see by reference to the last report of the Secretary of the Navy, page 996, that quite as great frauds can be perpetrated now as before fictitious bidding was abolished. The case to which I refer by way of illustration, for I have no time to do more than to refer to one case, is the contract of J. L. Savage, of date April 7, 1863, and under advertisement of February 12, 1863, for miscellaneous engineers' tools. The items were:

	Market value.
3 anvils, each.....	$50 00
2,000 pounds cotton waste at.....	80 40
18 chopping-handled axes, each.....	3 00
12 small axes, each.....	1 50
6 callipers, each.....	2 00
6 dividers, each.....	2 00
4 grindstones, each.....	30 00
6 hydraulic jacks, each.....	290 00
4 scale beams, each.....	50 00
12 sieves, each.....	5 00
50 scoop shovels, each.....	2 00
6 steel squares, each.....	2 00
6 iron squares, each.....	1 50
4 dozen monkey wrenches.....	150 00

Yet Savage was the lowest bidder for this class. His bid amounted to $4,689. The other bidders were H. D. Stover, $5,039, and H. J. Collins & Co., $4,700; all, doubtless, confederates to defraud the Treasury. Suppose all their bids had been rejected. Then, doubtless, one of them would have been selected to make an open purchase of the same articles, and we would have had a reenactment of the open-purchase transactions of C. W. Scofield & Co. in New York. Still, I have no hesitation in saying that the Bureau of Engineering ought to have at once rejected all the bids in this case, whether with or without law, even at the risk of being consigned to the tender mercies of a Navy agent and the open purchases of Scofield, Savage, or Stover. The only excuse for not doing so is to be found either in the immediate and pressing necessity for the articles contracted for, or in the fact that in the hurry and multiplication of business the attempt by the confederates to defraud the Government was not detected by the officers having the subject in charge.
